QUESTIONS PRESENTED

I.

Does an antitrust plaintiff who proves concerted action, overt acts, and a specific intent to monopolize also have to prove a relevant market as an essential element of a claim of combination or conspiracy to monopolize in violation of §2 of the Sherman Act?

II.

Did the court of appeals improperly deprive petitioners of their right to a trial by jury when it rejected the basis of the trial court's summary judgment against petitioners' claims under §1 of the Sherman Act, but nonetheless refused to remand those claims for trial based on speculative factual assumptions by the court of appeals about how they would have been tried to a jury?

PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

Major League Soccer, L.L.C. (MLS) and its separately owned operator/investors (the "MLS Defendants")—the entities controlling the only top-tier (Division I) soccer league in the United States—conspired with the United States Soccer Federation, Inc. (USSF), with the specific intent to exclude competitors and fix below-market salaries for Division I soccer players in the United States. The court of appeals held that plaintiffs, a class of professional soccer players, were required to prove not just concerted behavior, overt acts, and a specific intent to monopolize, but also the existence of a relevant market in order to challenge this anticompetitive scheme as a combination or conspiracy to monopolize in violation of §2 of the Sherman Act. The court of appeals' adoption of this minority position ignored the text of the Sherman Act, deepened an existing split among the circuits, and substantially undermined a significant area of antitrust policy. Plaintiffs ask the Court to grant this petition to resolve the increasing judicial confusion about this important federal question. Plaintiffs also ask the Court to grant this petition to make it clear that a court of appeals cannot deprive plaintiffs of their right to a trial by jury by simply assuming facts about how they would have tried their claims, in this case under §1 of the Sherman Act, had they been given an opportunity to do so.

CITATION OF COURT OF APPEALS OPINION

Fraser v. Major League Soccer, L.L.C., 284 F.3d 47 (CA1 2002).

BASIS FOR JURISDICTION

The United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit delivered its judgment and opinion in Fraser on March 20, 2002. The petition for rehearing en banc was denied on April 23, 2002. The Court has jurisdiction to hear this petition for certiorari under 28 U.S.C. §1254.

STATUTES INVOLVED

> "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal."

15 U.S.C. §1.

> "Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine."

15 U.S.C. §2.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This lawsuit arises from the anticompetitive agreement of defendants—the entities that control Division I soccer in the United States—to suppress player salaries to below-market levels by eliminating competition in two ways. First, they agreed upon a set of restraints in which the independently owned MLS operator/investors—unlike the owners of teams in every other major team sport—would be prevented from competing for and hiring players at the team level. Second, the MLS Defendants conspired with the USSF to certify MLS as the only Division I soccer league in the United States and to prevent other leagues from competing for Division I players. The specific purpose of this two-pronged conspiracy was to monopolize and suppress the salaries for Division I soccer players in the United States.

A. History of MLS

In 1988, FIFA, soccer's international governing body, awarded the USSF the right to host the 1994 World Cup soccer tournament in the United States.[1] This event created a business opportunity to establish Division I professional soccer in the United States. Alan Rothenberg, the President of the USSF, developed plans to establish such a league that were expressly intended to enable the teams to pay below-market salaries by eliminating all competition for players' services. A-1529:12-1531:3.[2] Concerned about the obvious antitrust implications of this anticompetitive objective, a 1990 memo mapped out the strategy for trying to evade the constraints of §1 of the Sherman Act by purporting to

[1] The USSF is a member of FIFA and claims the private right to determine who may be sanctioned as a professional soccer league in the United States.

[2] Citations to the appendix at the court of appeals are cited to as "A-[page number]." Citations to the appendix to this petition are cited as "App. at [page number]."

structure the new league as a "single entity," in which the teams would be precluded from competing with each other for players.

At the same time, the MLS operator/investors and the USSF concluded that to successfully suppress player salaries, they needed to prevent other Division I soccer leagues from forming in the United States and competing for players, noting that to "maintain the [proposed below-market] salary structure" for players, there could be no other "significant domestic professional league to compete for players' services." A-7683. As stated in MLS's business plan:

> "Over the last thirty-five years, the NHL, the NBA and the NHL [sic] have faced challenges from rival professional sports leagues. The American Football League was established in the early 1960s to compete with the [NFL]. The World Hockey Association was established in the early 1970s to compete with the NHL. While the three rival leagues ultimately merged into the more established leagues during the early years of their existence, these rival leagues precipitated bidding wars for the services of established star players and for the services of players graduating from the college ranks. In the event that a credible rival league were established, it is probable that the MLS salary structure would be jeopardized." A-7919.

In fact, in 1993, three different organizations were vying for USSF certification as Division I leagues so that they could compete with each other: Mr. Rothenberg's group, which became MLS; the American Professional Soccer League (APSL); and League One America. At a meeting on December 5, 1993, the USSF, in conspiracy with MLS, decided to sanction MLS as the exclusive Division I league in the United States. This decision blocked all competition because of the inability of other U.S. leagues to compete with MLS without a Division I certification.

During 1994, MLS and the USSF continued to conspire against the APSL, which was still trying to become a Division I competitor. For example, in a memo sent to Hank Steinbrecher, USSF Secretary General, and Richard Motzkin, USSF General Counsel, Rothenberg wrote that "neutrality was over" and instructed Steinbrecher and Motzkin to take actions on behalf of the USSF to prevent the APSL from competing as a Division I league. A-8102.

In 1995, the USSF reaffirmed MLS's designation as the exclusive Division I league in the United States, announcing that it would not even consider granting another league Division I status until 1998. Further, to protect MLS from competition after 1998, the USSF and MLS established additional anticompetitive barriers to entry in the form of professional division standards that no new Division I league would be able to meet. See A-6358 at 3051:3-3052:17, A-6359 at 3053:3-3054:15.

B. The MLS Defendants Are Not A Single Entity.

Despite their desire to shield themselves from the strictures of §1 of the Sherman Act, the MLS Defendants never adopted a true single entity structure. Although MLS is a limited liability company that owns all of the teams that play in the league and has "sole responsibility for negotiating and entering into agreements with, and for compensating, Players," 284 F.3d, at 53, the MLS Defendants insisted on maintaining distinct economic interests and autonomy in virtually all team business areas other than the hiring of players. For example, MLS operator/investors have a greater right to relocate, transfer, and receive value for the transfer of their MLS teams than NFL owners. A-3360:11-3361, A-3362:2-25, A-3363:8-3366:18, A-3367:15-3369:24, A-3372:15-3373:7, A-3375:8-22.

Moreover, the MLS operator/investors are separately owned entities who do not share profits and losses.

A-680:24-681:16, A-748:12-24, A-749:9-12, A-698:21-699:18, A-698:21-699:18, A-1241, A-702:12-20, A-1352-1353, A-691:9-22, A-695:13-1696:20, A-761:19-762:20, A-541:19-543:24, A-485:19-542:24, A-696:21-697:6. They conduct day-to-day team operations, handle all local marketing, and—subject to approval by the MLS Board (which is itself controlled by the operator/investors)—they negotiate all local broadcasting deals and set ticket prices. A-694:16-24, A-759:9-760:11, A-759:9-16, A-1346.

The MLS operator/investors are also in active competition with each other for all team employees other than players. They compete for general managers, front office personnel and coaches, and they set the salaries of those persons without league involvement. A-691:9-22, A-696:13-20, 761:19-762:20.

In sum, the MLS operator/investors maintain separate economic identities. They are economically indistinguishable from team owners in other sports leagues, except, of course, that they have agreed not to compete with each other for players.

C. The Players' Lawsuit

Eight individual MLS players and a certified injunctive class of Division I professional soccer players (collectively, "Fraser") sued MLS, the USSF, and the nine independent operator/investors in MLS teams. Fraser's first amended complaint alleges that defendants violated §1 of the Sherman Act by agreeing not to compete with each other for players. Fraser also alleges two conspiracies in violation of §2: (1) that MLS and its operator/investors combined and conspired with the USSF with the specific intent to monopolize in order to prevent other U.S. leagues from competing for players at the Division I level; and (2) that

MLS and its operator/investors combined and conspired to eliminate all competition for players among themselves, with the specific intent to monopolize.[3]

The defendants moved for summary judgment on the §1 claim, arguing that the MLS Defendants are a single entity and therefore incapable of conspiring in restraint of trade. The district court granted this motion. See Fraser v. Major League Soccer, 97 F.Supp.2d 130 (D. Mass. 2000). Trial was then set on Fraser's §2 claims. Before trial, however, the district court granted the defendants' motion in limine and held that Fraser could not introduce evidence that the conspiracy to eliminate competition among the MLS operator/investors was a violation of §2.

Fraser then proceeded to trial on the remaining §2 conspiracy claim—a charge that MLS and the USSF conspired to monopolize by excluding competing Division I leagues.[4] Over Fraser's objections, the court submitted jury instructions and a special verdict form requiring Fraser to prove the specific relevant market alleged as a threshold element of not just Fraser's claims of monopolization and attempt to monopolize, but also of Fraser's claim of a combination or conspiracy to monopolize. The trial court refused to submit Fraser's proposed jury instructions which would have made it clear that proof of a specific intent to monopolize, not proof of a relevant market, was required to establish Fraser's conspiracy to monopolize claim. See App. at 82a (proposed jury charge). The jury then returned a special verdict against [3] Fraser also alleged claims of actual and attempted monopolization in violation of §2 of the Sherman Act and claims of a violation of §7 of the Clayton Act. 284 F.3d, at 54-55. Those claims are not the subject of this petition.

[4] The trial also included Fraser's separate claims of actual monopolization and attempt to monopolize.

all of Fraser's §2 claims based solely on the trial court's relevant-market instructions. Judgment was thereafter entered against all of Fraser's claims.

The court of appeals affirmed the district court's judgment, but overturned its §1 analysis. See 284 F.3d, at 58. Specifically, the court of appeals set aside the district court's conclusion that the MLS Defendants were a single entity under the principles of Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752 (1984), noting that "the present case is not Copperweld but presents a more doubtful situation." 284 F.3d, at 58. Nevertheless, the court of appeals declined to remand Fraser's §1 claims, even though the court of appeals rejected the defendants' argument that, in trying them on remand, Fraser would be collaterally estopped from presenting evidence in support of a relevant market that was different from the one rejected by the jury in the §2 trial. See id., at 59-60. The court of appeals justified its decision not to remand by erroneously assuming that if Fraser's §1 claims had gone to trial, Fraser would have presented the jury with the same relevant market claims and evidence it submitted in trying its §2 claims. See id., at 60.

The court of appeals also rejected Fraser's argument that proof of a specific relevant market was not an essential element of a conspiracy to monopolize claim. In rejecting this argument and affirming the judgment below, the court of appeals conceded that it was adopting a minority position, which deepened the split among the circuit courts on this important issue of antitrust law and policy.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE PETITION

The court of appeals' decision ignores the text of the Sherman Act, misreads this Court's precedent, and deepens the split between the circuits on an antitrust issue of great significance. It subverts clear congressional intent manifest in the language of the statute by rendering the conspiracy to monopolize offense entirely redundant. It also departs from this Court's holding that the offense of conspiracy to monopolize is legally distinct from the offenses of monopolization and attempt to monopolize. The decision further ignores the well-established principle that §2 claims based on a conspiracy are more suspect than those based on unilateral action and, therefore, do not require any showing of market power in a relevant market. The Court should grant the petition to resolve what has become a pervasive split among the circuits on an important issue of antitrust policy.

Further, the Court should also grant the petition to reverse the court of appeals' refusal to remand Fraser's §1 claims, based on a factual assumption of how Fraser would have tried the relevant market issue had its §1 claims gone to a jury trial. Once the court of appeals concluded that the summary judgment single-entity ruling of the district court was erroneous, its only proper course was to remand Fraser's §1 claims for a trial. The Court should grant the petition to make it clear that a court of appeals cannot usurp the jury's function in this manner.

I. THE COURT SHOULD RESOLVE THE GROWING CIRCUIT SPLIT ON WHETHER PROOF OF A SPECIFIC RELEVANT MARKET IS AN ESSENTIAL ELEMENT OF A § 2 CONSPIRACY CLAIM.

As the Court recognized long ago, when Congress enacted §2 of the Sherman Act, it intended to create three distinct causes of action: one for monopolization, another for attempt to monopolize, and a third for conspiracy to monopolize. See American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 787-90 (1946). The Court also recognized the intent of Congress to make a §2 conspiracy to monopolize a separate offense from a §1 conspiracy in restraint of trade. See United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 224 (1940) ("the crime under §1 is legally distinct from that under §2"). As a majority of circuit courts have held, the principal way in which a conspiracy to monopolize claim is distinct from both other §2 and §1 Sherman Act violations is that the requirement of proof of market power in a relevant market is replaced by the requirement that the conspirators have acted together with the specific intent to monopolize. By erasing the distinction, the court of appeals undermined the intent of Congress to create a separate conspiracy to monopolize offense and seriously damaged antitrust policy.

A. The Court's Prior Decisions Demonstrate That Proof of a Specific Relevant Market Is Not an Essential Element of a Conspiracy to Monopolize Claim.

More than fifty years ago, the Court first addressed whether proof of market power in a relevant market is required in a §2 conspiracy case. See American Tobacco, supra, at 789. The Court's discussion of this issue was informed by an understanding, apparent from the text and structure of the Sherman Act, that Congress intended conspiracy to monopolize to be a separate offense from other provisions of the Sherman Act. The American Tobacco defendants were charged under §2 with both monopolizing and conspiring to monopolize. See id., at 788. Because the monopolization claim was based on a joint enterprise, the defendants argued that punishing them for both offenses was a double jeopardy violation. See id. In response, the Court first noted that a "conspiracy to commit a crime is a different offense from the crime that is the object of the conspiracy." See id., at 789 (quoting United States v. Rabinowich, 238 U.S. 78, 85 (1915)). The Court then held that the separate crimes of monopolizing and conspiracy to monopolize survived double jeopardy analysis because "[p]etitioners, for example, might have been convicted here of a conspiracy to monopolize without ever having acquired the power to carry out the object of the conspiracy, i.e., to exclude actual and potential competitors from the cigarette field." See id.

The absence of any requirement to prove market power in a relevant market in a conspiracy to monopolize case was emphasized again by the Court in United States v. Griffith, 334 U.S. 100 (1948), in which the Court cited American Tobacco for the proposition that "a conspiracy to monopolize violates §2 even though monopoly power was never acquired." Id., at 107 n.9. Since the only reason for establishing a relevant market in a monopolization case is to prove market power, there is no reason to impose such a requirement in a conspiracy to monopolize case.

In the context of the Sherman Act, it is well established that concerted behavior to monopolize is inherently more suspect than unilateral behavior to do so, thus warranting the deterrence of even incipient conspiracies:

> "The reason Congress treated concerted behavior more strictly than unilateral behavior is readily appreciated. Concerted activity inherently is fraught with anticompetitive risk. It deprives the marketplace of the independent centers of decision making that competition assumes and demands. In any conspiracy, two or more entities that previously pursued their own interests separately are combining to act as one for their common benefit . . . [o]f course, such mergings of resources may well lead to efficiencies that benefit consumers, but their anticompetitive potential is sufficient to warrant scrutiny even in the absence of incipient monopoly." Copperweld, 467 U.S., at 768-69.

Indeed, it was this very distinction between concerted anticompetitive behavior and unilateral acts that was cited by the Court as support for its decision in Spectrum Sports v.

McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447 (1993), to require proof of market power in a relevant market in an attempt to monopolize case:

> "[S]ingle-firm activity is unlike concerted activity covered by §1, which 'inherently is fraught with anticompetitive risk.' For these reasons, §2 makes the conduct of a single firm unlawful only when it actually monopolizes or dangerously threatens to do so." Id., at 459 (internal citations omitted).

This same distinction explains why a plaintiff alleging a conspiracy to monopolize should not be required to prove a specific relevant market, which clearly is not essential in the absence of a market power requirement.

Because Congress intended that conspiracy to monopolize be a distinct claim reaching anticompetitive behavior not covered by other provisions of the Sherman Act, the Court has long recognized that the elements of this offense are distinct from the elements of actual monopolization, attempt to monopolize, and §1 conspiracy in restraint of trade. The decision of the court of appeals, however, wipes out these distinctions and improperly interprets the conspiracy to monopolize offense as superfluous verbiage. If proof of a relevant market is an essential element of a conspiracy to monopolize claim, then no set of facts would prove a §2 conspiracy without also proving either a §1 conspiracy in restraint of trade, a §2 monopolization, or a §2 attempt to monopolize. That would be an unreasonable interpretation of the statutory language. See Potter v. United States, 155 U.S. 438, 446 (1894) (statutory language "cannot be regarded as mere surplusage; it means something").

B. Evidence of a Specific Intent to Monopolize Substitutes for Proof of Market Power in a Relevant Market in a Conspiracy to Monopolize Case.

This Court's prior cases discussing the §2 conspiracy offense implicitly recognize that the element of specific intent to monopolize serves the function that the requirement of proof of market power in a relevant market serves for other Sherman Act offenses. It ensures that only anticompetitive behavior is deterred and punished, while procompetitive behavior is not.

A specific intent to monopolize has a clear meaning in the context of the Sherman Act and carries a high evidentiary burden. It is the intent "to destroy competition or build monopoly," and it will not be found when an action is "predominantly motivated by legitimate business aims." See Times-Picayune Pub. Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 626-27 (1953). The element of specific intent to monopolize—combined with the requirement of concerted action—means that only concerted behavior intended to serve anticompetitive ends will be deterred and punished by §2.[5] When concerted behavior is intended to destroy competition or build a monopoly, it does not matter whether the actors have the power to achieve their objectives in a relevant market. Such concerted behavior is inherently anticompetitive and is of the kind that Congress intended to deter and punish in §2 of the Sherman Act.[6]

[5]See e.g., Hunt-Wesson Foods, Inc. v. Ragu Foods, Inc., 627 F.2d 919, 926 (CA9 1980) ("no particular level of market power or 'dangerous probability of success' has to be alleged or proved in a conspiracy claim where the specific intent to monopolize is otherwise apparent from the character of the actions taken"); Salco Corp. v. General Motors Corp., Buick Motor Div., 517 F.2d 567, 576 (CA10 1975) ("Section 2 makes it unlawful to conspire to monopolize 'any part' of interstate commerce. Specific intent to monopolize is the heart of a conspiracy charge, and a plaintiff is not required to prove what is the 'relevant market.'").

That is not to say that evidence of a relevant market might not be useful to a jury in assessing a claim of specific intent to monopolize. See Alexander v. Nat'l Farmers Org., 687 F.2d 1173, 1182 (CA8 1982). However, that showing is not, and should not be, the same rigorous showing of "relevant market" that is required for claims based on unilateral monopolization or attempt to monopolize. But that is precisely the error the court of appeals affirmed here, when it approved the trial court's instruction that Fraser bore the burden of proving the existence of the specific relevant market that had been alleged as a threshold element of each of his §2 claims, including conspiracy to monopolize.[7]

Equally important, by requiring proof of a relevant market to support a conspiracy to monopolize claim, the court of appeals contravened congressional intent by making the conspiracy to monopolize offense underinclusive. The decision presupposes that there can be no §2 violation without proof of a relevant market. But that supposition ignores the need to deter and punish concerted behavior with a specific intent to monopolize because of its lack of redeeming virtue and the threat that such conspiracies pose to competition policy. Copperweld and similar cases clearly acknowledge the intent of Congress to prohibit such concerted anti-competitive behavior, even when the parties do not have the power to fully effectuate the ends of their intended conspiracy. See Am. Tobacco, 328 U.S., at 789.

[6] In this sense, concerted behavior with a specific intent to monopolize under §2 is analogous to the type of pernicious concerted behavior that is condemned as per se unlawful under §1 without proof of market power or relevant market. See State Oil Co. v. Kahn, 522 U.S. 3, 10 (1997).

[7] Even the court of appeals appeared to recognize that a conspiracy to monopolize may require a lesser showing of a relevant market than that required for other offenses under §2 of the Sherman Act: "there may in principle be some cases in which one could argue that a conspiracy claim should be provable without a showing that the alleged market is a real economic market." 284 F.3d, at 68. However, just as it did with Fraser's §1 claims, the court of appeals ignored its duty to remand this issue to the jury and instead decided the facts itself, holding that the conspiracy to monopolize asserted by Fraser did not pose a sufficient competitive threat to warrant a lessening of the relevant market requirement applicable to other §2 offenses. See 284 F.3d, at 69.

In the trial below, even though the jury concluded that Fraser's asserted market definition was too narrow to support a claim of actual monopolization or attempt to monopolize, they still should have been permitted to determine whether Fraser had proven that defendants had conspired with the specific intent to monopolize. Under the district court's instructions, the jury was blocked from reaching this critical issue because, once the jury found that Fraser had not proven the specific relevant market that had been alleged, the charge prevented it from continuing to deliberate. By conditioning the jury's consideration of the essential elements of a §2 conspiracy claim on a finding of Fraser's proposed relevant market, the district court improperly shielded a category of conspiratorial conduct with a specific intent to monopolize that Congress clearly intended to prohibit.[8]

C. The Court Should Grant the Petition to Resolve the Deepening Split Among the Circuit Courts.

It has now become apparent that the circuit courts will not be able to resolve their disagreement on whether proof of a specific relevant market is an essential element of a §2

[8] While evidence of a specific intent to monopolize is often difficult to prove, even the court of appeals recognized the unique abundance of such evidence in this case, in which numerous documents and business plans demonstrated that defendants in fact conspired with the specific intent to exclude competing Division I leagues in order to enable MLS to pay its players below-market salaries. 284 F.3d, at 59.

conspiracy claim without the guidance of this Court. The split of authority on this issue is longstanding and deep. The majority view, endorsed by the Fourth, Eighth, Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, and Federal circuits, adheres to the formulation drawn from American Tobacco, and holds that proof of a relevant market is not required.[9] See ABA SAMPLE JURY INSTRUCTIONS IN CIVIL ANTITRUST CASES, C-100 to C-102 n.3 (1999 ed.) The First, Fifth, and Eleventh Circuits take the opposite view.[10] The Second Circuit has taken both positions, without reconciling them.[11]

[9] See, e.g., Intergraph Corp. v. Intel Corp., 195 F.3d 1346, 1363 (CA Fed. 1999) ("a [conspiracy to monopolize] claim requires deliberate concerted action with the specific intent to achieve an unlawful monopoly, accompanied by acts in furtherance of the conspiracy"); Advanced Health-Care Serv., Inc. v. Radford Cmty. Hosp., 910 F.2d 139, 150 (CA4 1990) (same); Monument Builders of Greater Kansas City, Inc. v. Am. Cemetery Ass'n of Kansas, 891 F.2d 1473, 1484 (CA10 1989) ("Conspiring to monopolize is a separate offense under section 2, requiring less in the way of proof than the other section 2 offenses." (quoting Perington Wholesale, Inc. v. Burger King Corp., 631 F.2d 1369, 1371 (CA10 1979)); Olsen v. Progressive Music Supply, Inc., 703 F.2d 432, 438 (CA10 1983) (holding that for a conspiracy to monopolize claim, "[a] relevant market need not be established"); Alexander, supra, at 1181 ("A section 2 claim for conspiracy to monopolize . . . generally does not require proof of a relevant market, at least not in the manner required in actual and attempted monopolization cases."); Hunt-Wesson Foods, supra, at 926. The court of appeals' reliance on Alexander as a case requiring a showing of a relevant market, 284 F.3d, at 67 n.16, is misplaced. While Alexander required some proof of product and geographic context, it held that "[t]he nature of such proof, . . . need not be as rigorous as the relevant market showing for other Section 2 claims, because actual attainment or 'dangerous probability' of monopoly power is not at issue in a conspiracy claim." 687 F.2d, at 1182.

been able to reach a consensus on whether proof of a specific relevant market is an essential element of a §2 conspiracy claim.[14]

The time has come for this Court to settle the split in the circuits. As businesses increasingly consolidate in response to changes in the global economy, it has become more important than ever before to have one consistent and coherent national antitrust policy. The circuit court split on the requirements for proving a conspiracy to monopolize makes it impossible for businesses and individuals to plan and conduct their affairs with any degree of certainty. Subjecting competitors to varying and incompatible standards of antitrust behavior imposes arbitrary risks that are destructive of antitrust policy.

The prevailing circuit split on the elements of a conspiracy to monopolize offense also encourages undesirable forum shopping and the perception of disparate treatment. Under the current state of the law, Fraser would have been entitled to its requested jury instructions had the case been brought in St. Louis or Denver instead of Boston. In New York, this issue might have been decided either way. This unequal treatment of the same claims in different circuits is fundamentally at odds with the objective of having a coherent national antitrust policy.

In recent years, the Court has taken pains to articulate one set of national standards that apply to claims under §1 of the Sherman Act, See, e.g., State Oil v. Kahn, supra; Palmer v. BRG of Georgia, Inc. 498 U.S. 46 (1990). It also has granted certiorari to resolve a split among the circuits on the essential elements of an attempt to monopolize claim. See Spectrum Sports, supra. Unless the Court also resolves the deepening split on the elements that are necessary to prove a conspiracy to monopolize, its careful efforts to provide guidance on what conduct is and is not a Sherman Act violation will be thwarted.

II. THE COURT SHOULD ALSO GRANT THE PETITION TO SEND A MESSAGE THAT COURTS OF APPEALS MAY NOT DENY A PLAINTIFF THE RIGHT TO A JURY TRIAL BY ASSUMING WHAT FACTS THE PLAINTIFF WOULD HAVE PRESENTED HAD SUCH A TRIAL TAKEN PLACE.

The right to a jury trial in civil cases "is a basic and fundamental feature of our system of federal jurisprudence . . . [a] right so fundamental and sacred to the citizen [that it] should be jealously guarded by the courts." Chauffeurs, Teamsters and Helpers Local No. 391 v. Terry, 494 U.S. 558, 580 (1990). The court of appeals' decision not to remand Fraser's §1 claims, after it held that the district court had erroneously granted summary judgment against such claims under a misreading of Copperweld, denied Fraser this vital right. Unless reversed, the decision threatens to establish a dangerous precedent under which courts of appeals can deny plaintiffs jury trials by simply making factual assumptions about what might have happened had such trials taken place.

The court of appeals rejected the district court's "single-entity" analysis under Copperweld, which the lower court had improperly relied upon to grant summary judgment against Fraser's §1 claims. See 284 F.3d, at 58. It also rightly concluded that Fraser would not have been collaterally estopped from arguing a different relevant market in support of his §1 claims on remand, had Fraser been given an opportunity to do so. Id., at 59-60. With these two holdings, the court of appeals should have concluded that an error of law by the district court deprived Fraser of the right to present his §1 claims to a jury, thus requiring that the §1 claims be remanded for trial. Were this a collateral proceeding brought in a parallel court, the fact that the relevant market issue for a §1 claim had never been presented to the jury in the first trial would, by itself, foreclose dismissing the second trial because of issue preclusion. "A judgment is not conclusive in a subsequent action as to issues which might have been but were not litigated and determined in the prior action." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS §27 com. e (1980).

The court of appeals' decision not to remand Fraser's §1 claims, because of its factual assumptions about how Fraser would have tried the relevant market issue in a §1 trial, was not only a procedural error, it was an abrogation of Fraser's constitutional right to a jury trial. As this Court has made clear, when a district court's error prevents a party from trying an issue to a jury, a reviewing court should remand. Describing its own jurisprudence on this issue in Lytle v. Household Mfg., Inc., the Court noted that when a district court's error results in a "wrongful denial of a petitioner's right to a jury trial on legal issues," the proper result is to reverse and remand for a jury trial. See 494 U.S. 545, 552-53 (1990). Indeed, when a claim has not been tried to a jury because of a legal error, remand and trial is "essential to vindicating . . . Seventh Amendment rights." Id., at 553.

The court of appeals' determination not to remand Fraser's §1 claims put it in the wholly improper position of speculating about what type of relevant market Fraser would have presented had a §1 trial been conducted. This factual speculation was clearly beyond the court's institutional competence. Moreover, the court of appeals' factual speculation was wrong. In the absence of any Copperweld defense, the agreement of the MLS Defendants not to compete for players was a facially anticompetitive horizontal agreement that should have been judged under the "quick look" rule-of-reason test, for which plaintiffs need not prove any relevant market. See, e.g., California Dental Ass'n v.

FTC, 526 U.S. 756, 770 (1999); NCAA v. Board of Regents of Univ. of Okla., 468 U.S. 85, 109-10 (1984). Fraser, therefore, could have tried his §1 claims without the need to prove any relevant market at all.

Further, even if it were proper to try Fraser's §1 claims under a full blown rule-of-reason analysis, it does not follow "that had the district court allowed the section 1 claim, it too would have been defeated by the jury's finding that the market alleged in the complaint had not been proved." 284 F.3d, at 60-61. Had Fraser been given an actual opportunity to try his §1 claims, he would have had an "incentive to allege a broader market" than under §2, because less market power is required to prevail in a §1 claim. Id., at 60.

Nor could the court of appeals justify its refusal to remand by speculating that the district court might have refused to allow Fraser to amend his pleadings to allege a different market in support of his §1 claims. 284 F.3d, at 60. It is well established that pleadings are generally deemed amended to conform to the evidence adduced at trial.[15] Further, a court of appeals cannot divest a trial court of its discretion to allow an amendment of the pleadings by deciding the issue in the first instance. See Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 401 U.S. 321, 330 (1971). The decision as to whether to allow an amendment depends on "[w]hat the plaintiff knew or should have known and what he did or should have done," Leonard v. Perry, 219 F.3d 25, 30 (CA1 2000), an issue that must be determined by the trial court.

As this Court has stated, "maintenance of the jury as a fact-finding body is of such importance and occupies so firm a place in our history and jurisprudence that any seeming curtailment of the right to a jury trial should be scrutinized with the utmost care.'" Beacon Theatres, Inc. v. Westover, 359 U.S. 500, 501 (1959). For this additional reason, the Court should grant this petition and leave no doubt that courts of appeals cannot deny parties their right to a jury trial by factually speculating—and then hypothetically rejecting—what the parties might have done at such a trial.

2, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1-2, and Clayton Act section 7, id. § 18, and seeking injunctive relief and monetary damages.[1] The district court granted summary judgment for defendants on the section 1 and Clayton Act counts. After a twelve-week long trial on the section 2 count, the jury returned a special verdict leading to judgment in favor of defendants. Players now appeal the disposition of all three counts. We begin with a statement of the background facts.

I. BACKGROUND FACTS

Despite professional soccer's popularity abroad, the sport has achieved only limited success in this country. Several minor leagues have operated here (four such leagues exist today), but before the formation of MLS, only one other U.S. professional league—the North American Soccer League ("NASL")—had ever obtained Division I, or top-tier, status. Launched in 1968, the NASL achieved some success before folding in 1985; MLS attributes the NASL's demise in part to wide disparities in the financial resources of the league's independently owned teams and a lack of centralized control.

In 1988, the USSF, the national governing body of soccer in the United States, 36 U.S.C. § 220501 et seq., was awarded the right to host the 1994 World Cup soccer tournament in the U.S. by the Federation Internationale de Football Association ("FIFA"), soccer's international governing body. In consideration for the coveted sponsorship rights, the USSF promised to establish a viable Division I professional soccer league in the U.S. as soon as possible.

[1] The plaintiffs comprise eight named MLS players and a certified injunctive class of 600 past, present, and future MLS players. The operator/investors named in the suit include: Kraft Soccer, LP; Anschutz Soccer, Inc.; Anschutz Chicago Soccer, Inc.; South Florida Soccer, LLC; Team Columbus Soccer, LLC; Team Kansas City Soccer, LLC; Los Angeles Soccer Partners, LP; Empire Soccer Club, LP; and Washington Soccer, LP.

The USSF decided as early as 1988 to sanction only one Division I professional league. The concern was that sanctioning rival leagues would dilute revenues, drive up costs, and thereby dim the long-term prospects for Division I soccer in the U.S. Indeed, MLS contends no other country has sanctioned more than one Division I league within its borders, although arrangements in other countries could be variously described.

Just before World Cup USA play began, in early December 1993, three organizations presented competing plans to develop a Division I professional soccer league to the USSF National Board of Directors. The three competing organizers were: League One America; the American Professional Soccer League ("APSL"), an existing Division II league; and Major League Professional Soccer ("MLPS"), the precursor to MLS, headed by the USSF's own president, Alan Rothenberg.

At its December 5, 1993, meeting the USSF board tentatively selected MLPS as the exclusive Division I professional soccer league in the U.S., based upon its relatively strong capitalization, higher proposed spending, business plan and management. The board also reaffirmed its intention to sanction only one Division I league. But in January 1995, the USSF announced that it would consider sanctioning additional leagues which could meet rigorous new financial and operating standards beginning with the 1998 season.

In the wake of a successful World Cup USA, MLS was officially formed in February 1995 as a limited liability company ("LLC") under Delaware law. The league is owned by a number of independent investors (a mix of corporations, partnerships, and one individual) and is governed by a management committee known as the board of governors.

Some of the investors are passive; others are also team operators as explained below.

MLS has, to say the least, a unique structure, even for a sports league. MLS retains significant centralized control over both league and individual team operations. MLS owns all of the teams that play in the league (a total of 12 prior to the start of 2002), as well as all intellectual property rights, tickets, supplied equipment, and broadcast rights. MLS sets the teams' schedules; negotiates all stadium leases and assumes all related liabilities; pays the salaries of referees and other league personnel; and supplies certain equipment.

At issue in this case is MLS's control over player employment. MLS has the "sole responsibility for negotiating and entering into agreements with, and for compensating, Players." In a nutshell, MLS recruits the players, negotiates their salaries, pays them from league funds, and, to a large extent, determines where each of them will play. For example, to balance talent among teams, it decides, with the non-binding input of team operators, where certain of the league's "marquee" players will play.

However, MLS has also relinquished some control over team operations to certain investors. MLS contracts with these investors to operate nine of the league's teams (the league runs the other three). These investors are referred to as operator/investors and are the co-defendants in this action. Each operator/investor has the "exclusive right and obligation to provide Management Services for a Team within its Home Territory" and is given some leeway in running the team and reaping the potential benefits therefrom.

Specifically, the operator/investors hire, at their own expense and discretion, local staff (including the general managers and coaches of their respective teams), and are responsible for local office expenses, local promotional costs for home games, and one-half the stadium rent (the same portion as MLS). In addition, they license local broadcast rights, sell home tickets, and conduct all local marketing on behalf of MLS; agreements regarding these matters do not require the prior approval of MLS. And they control a majority of the seats on MLS's board, the very same body which runs the league's operations. Among other things, the board is responsible for hiring the commissioner and approving national television contracts and marketing decisions, league rules and policies (including team player budgets), and sales of interests.

The operator/investors also play a limited role in selecting players for their respective teams. While the operating agreements provide that the operator/investors will not bid independently for players against MLS, they may trade players with other MLS teams and select players in the league's draft. Such transactions, however, must follow strict rules established by the league. Most importantly, no team may exceed the maximum player budget established by the management committee.

In return for the services of the operator/investors, MLS pays each of them a "management fee" that corresponds (in large part) to the performance of their respective team. The management fee equals the sum of one-half of local ticket receipts and concessions; the first $1,125,000 of local broadcast revenues, increasing annually by a percentage rate, plus a 30% share (declining to 10% by 2006) of any amount above the base amount; all revenues from overseas tours; a share of one-half the net revenues from the MLS Championship Game and a share of revenues from other exhibition games.

The remaining revenues of the league are distributed in equal portions to all investors. Thus, while the investors qua investors share equally in the league's profits and losses, the individual team operators qua operators fare differently depending at least in part on the financial performance of their respective teams. It bears mentioning, however, that neither the league nor, apparently, any of its teams has yet made a profit.

Although the league retains legal title to the teams, the operator/investors may transfer their operating rights, within certain limits, and retain much of the value created by their individual efforts and investments. Investors may transfer their ownership stakes and operating rights to other current investors without obtaining prior consent; transfers to outside investors, however, require a two-thirds majority vote of the board. For its part, MLS may terminate any operating agreement on its own initiative if, by a two-thirds vote of the board, an operator/investor is determined to have failed to act in the best interests of the league. If so, it must still pay such operator/investor fair market value for its operating rights and ownership interest.

The league began official play in 1996. The following February of 1997, eight named players sued MLS, the USSF, and the operator/investors under various antitrust theories. The injunctive class was certified in January of 1998. Fraser v. Major League Soccer, LLC, 180 F.R.D. 178 (D.Mass. 1998). In count I, the players claimed MLS and its operator/investors violated Sherman Act section 1 by agreeing not to compete for player services. In count III,[2] the players claimed MLS monopolized or attempted to monopolize, or combined or conspired with the USSF to monopolize, the market for the services of Division I professional soccer players in the U.S., in violation of Sherman Act section 2, by preventing any other entity from being sanctioned as a Division I professional soccer league in the United States or otherwise competing against MLS. In count IV, the players claimed that the combination of assets of the operator/ investors in MLS substantially lessened competition and tended to create monopoly in violation of Clayton Act section 7.

In February 1998, before the close of discovery, MLS and its operator/investors moved for summary judgment on counts I and IV; players cross-moved, seeking to block MLS from asserting a single entity defense on count I. On April 19, 2000, the district court granted MLS summary judgment on both counts, holding that MLS and its operator/investors comprised a single entity and as such, could not conspire in violation of section 1. Fraser v. Major League Soccer, LLC, 97 F.Supp.2d 130, 135-39 (D.Mass.2000). On the section 7 claim, the court held that the creation of MLS "did not reduce competition in an existing market because when the company was formed there was no active market for Division I professional soccer in the United States." Id. at 141.

Subsequently, at a June 2000 status conference on the remaining section 2 claims, players indicated (apparently for the first time) that they intended to introduce evidence that MLS prohibited all competition for players among the MLS operators/investors as part of their section 2 claim as well. The court, however, prohibited players from introducing evidence on the operation of MLS—except to the extent it provided the jury with useful background information—finding this version of players' monopoly conduct argument precluded by its earlier section 1 summary judgment decision.

A three-month jury trial commenced in September 2000 on players' remaining section 2 claims. At the close of evidence, the court dismissed the section 2 claims against the operator/investors, and that ruling is not appealed now, leaving only MLS and the USSF as defendants. Fed.R.Civ.P. 50. The court then submitted a 15-question special verdict form to the jury. On December 11, 2000, the jury returned its verdict after answering only the first two questions. It found that players had failed to prove what they had alleged, namely, that the relevant geographic market is the United States and that the relevant product market is limited to Division I professional soccer players. The court thereafter entered judgment dismissing count III and denied players' Rule 50 motions. Players then filed this appeal.

II. SHERMAN ACT SECTION 1

Some have urged that sports leagues in general be treated as single entities—individual sports teams, after all, must collaborate to produce a product. Cf. Chicago Prof'l Sports Ltd. P'ship v. NBA, 95 F.3d 593, 599-600 (7th Cir.1996); NFL v. N. Am. Soccer League, 459 U.S. 1074, 103 S.Ct. 499, 74 L.Ed.2d 639 (1982) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari). However, this approach has not been adopted in this circuit, Sullivan v. NFL, 34 F.3d 1091, 1099 (1st Cir.1994), and we must work with the framework of existing circuit law. Single entity status for ordinarily organized leagues has been rejected in several other circuits as well.[3]

Even so, the district court concluded that under Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 104 S.Ct. 2731, 81 L.Ed.2d 628 (1984), MLS and its operator/investors were uniquely integrated and did comprise a single entity. Copperweld established that a parent and its wholly owned subsidiary are not subject to attack under section 1 for agreements between them. They are treated for section 1 purposes as a single economic actor. But what the Supreme Court has never decided is how far Copperweld applies to [3] E.g., Los Angeles Mem'l Coliseum Comm'n v. NFL, 726 F.2d 1381, 1388-90 (9th Cir.1984); N. Am. Soccer League v. NFL, 670 F.2d 1249, 1256-58 (2d Cir.1982); Smith v. Pro Football, Inc., 593 F.2d 1173, 1185-86 (D.C.Cir.1978); Mackey v. NFL, 543 F.2d 606, 620 (8th Cir.1976).

more complex entities and arrangements that involve a high degree of corporate and economic integration but less than that existing in Copperweld itself.

While MLS defends the district court's single entity ruling, players say that this view is form over substance and the substance is simply a conspiracy among de facto team owners to fix player salaries, which they claim to be a per se violation of the antitrust laws. We disagree completely with this latter characterization. We also find that the case for applying single entity status to MLS and its operator/investors has not been established but that in this case the jury verdict makes a remand on the section 1 claim unnecessary.

If ordinary investors decided to set up a company that would own and manage all of the teams in a league, it is hard to see why this arrangement would fall outside Copperweld's safe harbor. Certainly the potential for competition within the firm is not enough: after all, a railroad could in theory provide alternative routes between the same cities and a grocery could locate competing branches of its chain quite near one another; yet no law requires competition within a company. It is common practice, but hardly essential, that the teams in a sports league have independent owner/managers.

Further, MLS is manifestly more than an arrangement for individual operator/investors by which they can cap player salaries. In many ways, MLS does resemble an ordinary company: it owns substantial assets (teams, player contracts, stadium rights, intellectual property) critical to the performance of the league; a substantial portion of generated revenues belongs to it and is to be shared conventionally with both operator/investors and passive investors. And the fact that MLS was structured with the aim of achieving results that might not otherwise be possible does not automatically condemn it.

Focusing on the operator/investors' role as stockholders, the district court stressed that both sides of the supposed conspiracy were parts of the same corporate entity; and it noted that "unlike MLS, NFL football clubs do not exist as part of an overarching corporate structure." Fraser, 97 F.Supp.2d at 138 n. 10. And, as Copperweld itself shows, its protection is not lost merely because there are separate legal entities—here, the operator/investors—or because one posits arrangements between them and MLS that could not be made by existing competitors without violating the antitrust laws.

Nevertheless, it is hard to treat the corporate integration as conclusive. The challenge here is primarily to the operator/investors' role as team managers, not as ordinary stockholders, and to restrictions imposed on them in that role preventing competition for player services. That a stockholder may be insulated by Copperweld when making ordinary governance decisions does not mean automatic protection when the stockholder is also an entrepreneur separately contracting with the company.[4] Above all, there are functional differences between this case and Copperweld that are significant for antitrust policy.

First, there is a diversity of entrepreneurial interests that goes well beyond the ordinary company. MLS and its operator/investors have separate contractual relationships giving the operator/investors rights that take them part way along the path to ordinary sports team owners: they do some independent hiring and make out-of-pocket investments in their own teams; they retain a large portion of the revenues from the activities of their teams; and each has limited sale rights in its own team that relate to specific assets and not just shares in the common enterprise. One might well ask why the formal difference in corporate structure should warrant treating MLS differently than the National Football League or other traditionally structured sports leagues.

[4] Cf. Victorian House, Inc. v. Fisher Camuto Corp., 769 F.2d 466, 469-70 (8th Cir.1985), and Greenville Publ'g Co., Inc. v. Daily Reflector, Inc., 496 F.2d 391, 399-400 (4th Cir.1974) (both cases standing for the proposition that antitrust immunity covering an action between a corporation and its agent does not extend to action of the agent acting in its own behalf).

This contrasts with Copperweld's observation that the parent and its wholly owned subsidiary in that case shared a "complete unity of interests." 469 U.S. at 771, 105 S.Ct. 1005. The phrase is not self-executing and, in addition, it could be taken to explain Copperweld's result without being an outer limit of the defense. Chicago Prof'l Sports, 95 F.3d at 598. Still, the existence of distinct entrepreneurial interests possessed by separate legal entities distinguishes Copperweld; it further indicates that certain functions have already been disaggregated and assigned to different entities; and it makes the potential for actual competition closer to feasible realization.

Second, in this case the analogy to a single entity is weakened, and the resemblance to a collaborative venture strengthened, by the fact that the operator/investors are not mere servants of MLS; effectively, they control it, having the majority of votes on the managing board. The problem is especially serious where, as here, the stockholders are themselves potential competitors with MLS and with each other. Here, it is MLS that has two roles: one as an entrepreneur with its own assets and revenues; the other (arguably) as a nominally vertical device for producing horizontal coordination, i.e., limiting competition among operator/investors.

From the standpoint of antitrust policy, this prospect of horizontal coordination among the operator/investors through a common entity is a distinct concern. Whatever efficiencies may be thought likely where a single entrepreneur makes decisions for a corporate entity (or set of connected entities), the presumption is relaxed—and may in some contexts be reversed—where separate entrepreneurial interests can collaborate; the fixing of above market prices by sellers is the paradigm.[5] This does not make MLS a mere front for price fixing, but it does distinguish Copperweld by introducing a further danger and a further argument for testing it under section 1's rule of reason.

To sum up, the present case is not Copperweld but presents a more doubtful situation; MLS and its operator/investors comprise a hybrid arrangement, somewhere between a single company (with or without wholly owned subsidiaries) and a cooperative arrangement between existing competitors. And, of course, there is not one kind of hybrid but a range of possibilities (imagine the operator/investors with their separate entrepreneurial interests but without their control of MLS). The question is what legal approach to take.

The law at this point could develop along either or both of two different lines. One would expand upon Copperweld to develop functional tests or criteria for shielding (or refusing to shield) such hybrids from section 1 scrutiny for intra-enterprise arrangements. This would be a complex task and add a new layer of analysis; but where the analysis shielded the arrangement it would serve to cut off similarly difficult, intrusive scrutiny of such intra-enterprise activities under extremely generalized rule of reason standards.[6] It would also prevent claims, clearly inappropriate in our view, under per se rules or precedents dealing with arrangements between existing independent competitors.

[5] A less vivid but closer parallel is a situation in which dealers or franchises, by control or coercion, make the manufacturer or franchiser impose on them restrictions that the dealers or franchisees select. See United States v. Topco Assocs., 405 U.S. 596, 92 S.Ct. 1126, 31 L.Ed.2d 515 (1972); United States v. Sealy, 388 U.S. 350, 87 S.Ct. 1847, 18 L.Ed.2d 1238 (1967); General Leaseways v. Nat'l Truck Leasing Ass'n, 744 F.2d 588 (7th Cir.1984); see also XII Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 2033b (1999).

[6] There is some, although not a lot of, circuit case law that looks in this direction. City of Mt. Pleasant v. Associated Elec. Coop., Inc., 838 F.2d 268, 274-77 (8th Cir.1988); see also Chicago Prof'l Sports, 95 F.3d at 598.

The other course is to reshape section 1's rule ofreason toward a body of more flexible rules for interdependent multi-party enterprises. Sports leagues are a primary example but so are common franchising arrangements and joint ventures that perform specific services for competitors (e.g., a common purchasing entity, see Northwest Wholesale Stationers, Inc. v. Pac. Stationery and Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 105 S.Ct. 2613, 86 L.Ed.2d 202 (1985)). Certainly the trend of section 1 law has been to soften per se rules and to recognize the need for accommodation among interdependent enterprises.[7]

The same choice of approach presents itself in franchise cases. There, too, we have a close but not complete integration of separate entities under separate entrepreneurial control. Traditionally, vertically imposed arrangements restricting competition among franchisees have been tested (and often upheld) under the rule of reason. E.g., Am. Motor Inns v. Holiday Inns, Inc., 521 F.2d 1230, 1241-43 (3d Cir. 1975); see also 1 Glickman, Franchising § 4.03[2] (2001); XII Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 2033 (1999). Yet since Copperweld, several district court decisions have avoided the section 1 inquiry by deeming franchiser and franchisee part of a single entity.[8]

[7] E.g., NCAA v. Bd. of Regents, 468 U.S. 85, 100-103, 104 S.Ct. 2948, 82 L.Ed.2d 70 (1984); McCormack v. NCAA, 845 F.2d 1338, 1344 (5th Cir.1988); Los Angeles Mem'l Coliseum, 726 F.2d at 1387; N. Am. Soccer League, 670 F.2d at 1258-59; Smith, 593 F.2d at 1177-81; Mackey, 543 F.2d at 619-20.

[8] The criteria suggested in these cases are so general and so various (unity of interest, lack of existing competition, extent of control), as to emphasize the lack of any developed body of law. See Search Int'l, Inc. v. Snelling & Snelling, 168 F.Supp.2d 621, 624-26 (N.D.Tex.2001); St.

Once one goes beyond the classic single enterprise, including Copperweld situations, it is difficult to find an easy stopping point or even decide on the proper functional criteria for hybrid cases. To the extent the criteria reflect judgments that a particular practice in context is defensible, assessment under section 1 is more straightforward and draws on developed law. Indeed, the best arguments for upholding MLS's restrictions—that it is a new and risky venture, constrained in some (perhaps great) measure by foreign and domestic competition for players, that unquestionably creates a new enterprise without combining existing competitors—have little to do with its structure.

In all events, we conclude that the single entity problem need not be answered definitively in this case. The case for expanding Copperweld is debatable and, more so, the case for applying the single entity label to MLS. But even if we assume that section 1 applies, it is clear to us that the venture cannot be condemned by per se rules and presents at best a debatable case under the rule of reason. More significantly, as structured by plaintiffs themselves, this case would have been lost at trial based on the jury's rejection of plaintiffs' own market definition.

The rejection of the per se rule is straightforward. Although players portray MLS as a sham for horizontal price fixing, the extent of real economic integration is obvious. Further, MLS and its investors did not compete previously; the arrangement was formed as a risky venture against a background of prior failure, cf. United States v. Jerrold Elecs. Corp., 187 F.Supp. 545, 556-68 (E.D.Pa.1960), aff'd, 365 U.S. 567, 81 S.Ct. 755, 5 L.Ed.2d 806 (1961); and the outcome has been to add new opportunities for players—a Division I soccer league in the United States—and to raise salaries for soccer players here above existing levels.

The possibility that a less integrated and restrictive salary regime might make some individual salaries even higher is hardly conclusive. Without the restrictions, MLS might not exist or, if it did, might have larger initial losses and a shorter life. This would hardly enhance competition. Thus, the effects of the MLS arrangement are simply too uncertain to warrant application of the per se rule. NCAA v. Bd. of Regents, 468 U.S. at 100-103, 104 S.Ct. 2948. As in any other non-per se case, players would have to show that MLS exercised significant market power in a properly defined market, that the practices in question adversely affected competition in that market and that on balance the adverse effects on competition outweighed the competitive benefits. See Augusta News Co. v. Hudson News Co., 269 F.3d 41, 49 (1st Cir.2001).

Here, the jury said that neither the United States nor Division I delimited the relevant market—findings that imply that MLS faced significant competition for player services both from outside the United States and from non-Division I teams. That inference at a minimum creates uncertainty as to whether the jury could have found market power under section 1. However, the peculiar assemblage of evidence, including MLS-authored materials suggesting that it expected to exercise some control over player salaries (see Part III below), makes it impossible to rule out abstractly the possibility of a jury finding of MLS market power in a broader market.

MLS has urged that the jury verdict rejecting the United States/Division I market urged by plaintiffs should be preclusive. The argument purportedly rests on the doctrine of collateral estoppel. We agree with the plaintiffs that collateral estoppel goes no further than to preclude them at a new trial from urging the market already rejected by the jury. Restatement (Second) of Judgments §§ 27-28 (1982). In theory, there may be a broader market which plaintiffs might show (without contradicting the jury findings) in which unrestricted salary competition between the MLS operator/investors might result in somewhat higher player salaries. In that event, assuming that the single entity defense failed, a basis for liability might exist.

However, we have been given no reason to think that any other market would have been alleged and made the subject of proof if the section 1 claim had gone to trial along with the section 2 claims. In their complaint, the plaintiffs' main theory under count I was that MLS operated as a price-fixing or group boycott conspiracy for which no market power needed to be shown. A relevant market was nevertheless alleged in count I, apparently because the plaintiffs recognized that a pro-competitive purpose might be urged and a rule of reason balancing might be required. That relevant market was described by count I, as in the section 2 and section 7 counts, as competition for Division I soccer players in the United States. See Plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint ¶¶ 32, 59, 70, 78.

Proof of such a market was the consistent theme of plaintiffs' section 2 trial evidence. To be sure, had the section 1 claim been put to trial, the plaintiffs could have sought to amend their complaint to allege a different market, but there is no obvious reason to think that they would have done so. The United States/Division I theory alleged in the complaint was the most favorable for each of their claims and the easiest to define; and the focus on a single market theory would have allowed the plaintiffs to focus their proof on a single market definition. Plaintiffs did have some incentive to allege a broader market under sections 1 and 7,[9] but that incentive existed when they filed their complaint as well.

Even if the players had sought to amend their complaint after summary judgment, we have great doubt whether such an amendment would have been permitted. See Acosta-Mestre v. Hilton Int'l of P.R., Inc., 156 F.3d 49, 51-52 (1st Cir.1998). The district court granted summary judgment in April 2000—more than three years after the initial complaint was filed, more than one year after discovery was largely complete, and barely five months before beginning of trial. At that point in the proceedings, adding a new market theory would have substantially altered the contours of the case—potentially requiring new discovery and expert analyses based on the new alleged market.[10]

We thus have every reason to think that if the section 1 claim had not been dismissed on summary judgment it would have been presented at trial with the same market analysis alleged in the complaint. It follows that had the district court allowed the section 1 claim, it too would have been defeated by the jury's finding that market alleged in the complaint had not been proved. Accordingly, any error in dismissing the claim based on a single entity theory was harmless so long as the jury verdict stands, a matter we address in the next

[9] Whereas section 2 requires monopoly power or a prospect of it, significant market power is enough to trigger section 1's rule of reason approach; similarly, something less than monopoly power is required to condemn mergers under section 7's "substantially lessen competition" test. Columbia Metal Culvert Co. v. Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp., 579 F.2d 20, 27 n. 11 (3d Cir.1978).

[10] Indeed, by June 1999, players' economic expert, Roger Noll, had concluded that the relevant market was limited to U.S. Division I soccer; he did not attempt to define any alternative market, nor did he suggest that MLS might exercise market power in some broader market.

section. The outcome, as the plaintiffs shaped their own case, would have been the same. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 260 F.3d 54, 62 (1st Cir.2001).

III. SHERMAN ACT SECTION 2

At trial, players alleged three possible violations of section 2: that MLS monopolized the market for Division I professional soccer in the U.S.; that it attempted to monopolize that market; and that it conspired with the USSF to monopolize the same market. The jury found that players had failed to establish the relevant market as alleged; it reached no other issue in the case. The court thereafter entered judgment for the defendants on all three section 2 claims.

Monopolization and attempted monopolization claims. At the outset, players contend that the district court erred by refusing to allow them, in their monopolization and attempted monopolization claims, to argue that elimination of competition for players was an anticompetitive means of monopolization. The district court did so on the ground that this argument would simply resurrect the section 1 claim that had already been rejected by its single entity ruling; section 2 remained available to attack the exclusivity arrangement between MLS and the USSF, which was the gravamen of the complaint's section 2 count. Players respond that the same conduct may constitute an element of both antitrust claims.

To show monopolization, players had to prove that MLS had engaged in an act that helped create or maintain its alleged monopoly. III Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 650a (rev. ed.1996). In section 2 cases, the wrongful act is usually one designed to exclude competitors from the market (e.g., predatory price, exclusive dealing). See Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 605 & n. 32, 105 S.Ct. 2847, 86 L.Ed.2d 467 (1985). If MLS and its operator/investors are viewed as a single competitor, then the league's centralized hiring structure hardly constitutes an exclusionary act, even if it results in below-market wages for players. See Kartell v. Blue Shield of Mass., Inc., 749 F.2d 922, 927 (1st Cir.1984). After all, suppressing player salaries ought to spur, rather than impair, competition from rival leagues.

However, if the operator/investors are viewed instead more as individual potential competitors—an issue that we (unlike the district court) have not decided—it is not difficult to see how an agreement among them not to compete—a mirror image of players' section 1 claim—might create a monopsony and eliminate competition among them. See III Areeda & Hovenkamp, supra, at ¶ 703a. Such an act would arguably "exclude" competition for purposes of section 2, even if it did not harm individual competitors. Anyway, "exclusion" is only a gloss on the statutory term "monopolize"; and "merger to monopoly," benign as to the merged competitors, is a feasible section 2 claim, see Golden Grain Macaroni Co. v. FTC, 472 F.2d 882, 886 (9th Cir.1972), even if it is more often challenged under Clayton Act section 7, which requires much less.

Nonetheless, the jury's findings remain as an obstacle. Attempt and monopolization both require a showing that a market has been or may well be subject to monopoly power, Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 457-58, 113 S.Ct. 884, 122 L.Ed.2d 247 (1993); the only market alleged by the players was rejected by the jury; and this dooms the players' section 2 claims regardless of which practice—the exclusive arrangement with the USSF or the agreement not to compete for players—is alleged to satisfy the exclusionary act element of the cause of action. This assumes, however, that the jury verdict stands.

Not surprisingly, players next shift their focus to the jury verdict. They say the jury's market findings were tainted by several trial errors. We review the jury instructions de novo, Ponce v. Ashford Presbyterian Cmty. Hosp., 238 F.3d 20, 24

(1st Cir.2001), and the court's evidentiary rulings for abuse of discretion unless (as is occasionally true) an issue of abstract law is presented, United States v. Sposito, 106 F.3d 1042, 1046 (1st Cir.1997).

First, players say the court's instructions to the jury on how to define the relevant market were inaccurate and misleading. Players claim the instructions left the jury unable to weigh the significance of evidence showing that some MLS players had employment opportunities in other leagues. For example, MLS offered testimony that its players had played in 67 different foreign leagues, prior to or after playing for MLS; plaintiffs countered that the opportunities were more limited and less attractive than MLS claimed.

Specifically, plaintiffs complain that the district court refused to give two requested instructions: first, that the jury in defining the relevant market "should consider whether any effective competition significantly restrains MLS's ability to control wages for its players"; and second, that the jury should include in the relevant market only those leagues which are "sufficiently attractive and practically available to a large enough number of MLS players to prevent MLS from having the power to pay wages below competitive market levels."

The first problem is that the plaintiffs did not preserve these two requests by making, as Fed.R.Civ.P. 51 requires, a post-instruction objection "stating distinctly the matter objected to and the grounds of the objection." Plaintiffs did not repeat these two requests in the same words; instead they objected after the charge that the instructions had overemphasized the concept of substitutability at the expense of "other factors" that have been identified in the case law, which plaintiffs' brief in this court says includes "the ability of other leagues to constrain the power of MLS to depress plaintiffs' wages."

Unfortunately, plaintiffs' counsel did not spell out the last quoted objection at the post-charge conference. To refer only to "other factors" obviously does not tell the judge just what previously requested instruction has been omitted or identify the factors claimed to be insufficiently stressed. Davis v. Rennie, 264 F.3d 86, 100 (1st Cir.2001). Accordingly, the failure to give the two instructions in question is reviewed only for "plain error"; especially in a civil case this is a very hard test to meet because over and above plain error, it requires a showing both of prejudice and a miscarriage of justice or something of this magnitude. See id. at 101.

As it happens, the district court gave standard instructions on market definition which, to a considerable extent, tracked the ABA's model jury instructions in civil antitrust cases. ABA Sample Jury Instructions in Civil Antitrust Cases, at C-6 to C-13 (1999). It defined monopoly power as "the power to pay lower than competitive wages for the services being acquired without having the sellers of those services—the players--turn to another league or team for employment"; and it explained that the geographic market was the geographic area "to which players can turn, as a practical matter, for alternate opportunities for employment as professional soccer players." Accord United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 357-61, 83 S.Ct. 1715, 10 L.Ed.2d 915 (1963); Tampa Elec. Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 327, 81 S.Ct. 623, 5 L.Ed.2d 580 (1961).

The district court could permissibly have enlarged on the issue, explaining (for example) that a foreign league would be more likely part of the market as the number of players who could turn to it increased. But how much to elaborate is largely the discretion of the district court, Interstate Litho Corp. v. Brown, 255 F.3d 19, 29 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, ___ U.S. ___, 122 S.Ct. 666, 151 L.Ed.2d 580 (2001), and in some respects, the players' more detailed formulation could itself be misleading: MLS could be constrained so long as enough individual players had an alternative foreign league even if an individual foreign league would by itself attract or be available to only a small number of players.[11]

Next, players claim the court erred in permitting Alan Rothenberg, one of the founders of MLS and former president of the USSF, to testify about a legal opinion received by the USSF while shielding the opinion from discovery or questioning. On direct and then on cross-examination, Rothenberg disclosed without detail that the USSF board had obtained a legal opinion that it was lawful to grant exclusive Division I certification to a single league. At trial, the players sought to discover the opinion or have all references to it struck. The court denied both requests, finding that Rothenberg had not waived the attorney-client privilege by making his brief references.

It is true, as MLS asserts, that the statement was first adduced on direct examination by plaintiffs, and its repetition on cross added nothing new. On the other hand, plaintiffs did not ask the witness whether a legal opinion had been sought or about its contents. The witness, himself a lawyer, more or less volunteered this information. Possibly, the district judge felt that the disclosure, even if not directly invited, was legitimate because otherwise the witness—who had been asked whether antitrust concerns had been raised by the USSF board—would have been forced to leave the impression that they had been raised but not seriously addressed or resolved.

We think that if defense counsel had adduced this disclosure in the first instance it would be unfair to allow the legal opinion to be used affirmatively without allowing plaintiffs to examine it or, at the very least, requiring a severe [11] It is well-settled that a party claiming that an instruction should have been given forfeits the objection if the instruction it tenders is itself objectionable. See Savard v. Marine Contracting, Inc., 471 F.2d 536, 540 (2d Cir.1972).

limiting instruction (which plaintiffs did not request). The case law is mixed as to whether there is a waiver of the privilege where there is a very limited disclosure as to the ultimate opinion without a disclosure of contents and the answer may depend upon context.[12] But on our facts, it is fairly arguable that the plaintiffs opened the door to the response and, if so, could not use their own conduct to force the waiver.

So viewed, the district court's decision is tested under an abuse of discretion standard, and we are unwilling to say that the decision here was an abuse. Whatever discomfort we feel—and there is some—is assuaged by our grave doubt that Rothenberg's disclosure of the opinion as to lawfulness could have had any effect on a jury verdict that plaintiffs had failed to prove the relevant market they alleged. Plaintiffs make a stab at showing prejudice by equating the failure to prove the relevant market with lawfulness; but although this might be plausible in the abstract, the notion that the jury decided an essentially factual issue, as to which there was a mass of conflicting evidence, on the basis of a brief reference to a legal opinion seems to us highly remote.

Next, players say the court erred in excluding two pieces of documentary evidence that supported their claims of market definition and market power. The first is a September 1994 correspondence between Clark Hunt, a prospective MLS operator/investor, and Mark Abbott, an executive working on the formation of MLS, regarding assumptions made in a financial model disseminated by the league's organizers. Hunt later became an operator/investor in the league through a firm he helped form, which was a defendant below; Abbott became a senior league officer.

[12] See United States v. Desir, 273 F.3d 39, 45-46 (1st Cir.2001); Frontier Ref., Inc. v. Gorman-Rupp, 136 F.3d 695, 704 (10th Cir.1998); Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc. v. Home Indem. Co., 32 F.3d 851, 863 (3d Cir.1994).

In his letter, Hunt urged that the team player salary budget be reduced by $70,000, with the "bulk of the reduction" coming from the "bottom 12 players on each team whose only alternative is to play in one of the other U.S. professional leagues or one of the lower division foreign leagues." Hunt also suggested that salary growth should also be limited to five percent a year, reasoning that "[u]ntil there is significant domestic-based competition for MLS players, the rate of salary growth should be relatively easy to contain." In response, Abbott cautioned that "a reduction of $70,000 in player salaries per team [would] impact the quality of players we are able to attract." At the same time, he agreed that, "for modeling purposes the player salaries should be held to [a] 5% [increase] per year."

The court excluded the correspondence, finding it irrelevant since it was not "made by someone who matters to the case" and the transcript then reveals a four-page colloquy in which the parties argue about the issue with the judge. Plaintiffs' main basis for urging admission of the Hunt letter was that it tended to show Hunt's own intent to monopolize, the suggestion being that this view should also be attributed to the firm that Hunt formed (apparently later) which became an operator/investor and defendant in the case. On this appeal, plaintiffs switch grounds and urge that the Hunt letter and Abbott's reply as well were evidence of plaintiffs' proposed market definition.

Whether the evidence should have been admitted to show intent on the attempt to monopolize claim is a nice issue but irrelevant here since the jury resolved the case on market definition grounds. Plaintiffs' present claim that the evidence should have been admitted to bolster their market theory and show the existence of monopoly power founders because it was never offered for that purpose. See United States v. Josleyn, 206 F.3d 144, 154 (1st Cir.2000). Further, although no hearsay objection was made, an interesting question remains whether Hunt's statement as a prospective investor is properly admissible for either purpose as an admission of the defendant firm that Hunt later helped form. Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2).

As to Abbott's letter, it appears from the transcript that the court was prepared to consider admitting the letter without the Hunt document but plaintiffs' counsel understandably demurred. Abbott's statements are quite tame (the first suggests a lack of market power as to quality players and the second was "for modeling purposes"). Plaintiffs' further suggestion—that Abbott was adopting on behalf of MLS whatever was said in the Hunt letter—is a stretch that the language of the letter does not support.

Further, any error was harmless. Players were allowed to introduce numerous other documents, authored by MLS itself, expressing virtually the same opinions. For example, players were allowed to introduce a November 1995 offering memorandum, in which MLS admits that it "does not view [the Division I and Division II or indoor soccer leagues] as significant competition." [13] And at trial, players' economic expert, Roger Noll, relied on these documents to support his testimony and conclusions. The excluded correspondence was thus redundant and could hardly have changed the outcome.

The next piece of evidence is a March 1994 internal memorandum written by two employees of the investment firm Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette ("DLJ"). MLS's pro-

[13] Players also introduced the league's 1993 business plan, in which MLS asserted that it would be able to maintain its salary structure because "[i]t is not anticipated that there will be any other significant domestic professional league to compete for players' services." Another document allowed in evidence, a December 1994 offering memorandum, said "MLS believes it will be able to maintain this salary structure because of the competitiveness of the salary and benefit package and the lack of comparable alternatives in the United States to players."

moters had approached DLJ to act as its financial advisor. In the memo, the DLJ employees conclude that MLS has favorable prospects for success, noting, inter alia, that the league will "be able to operate with a strict salary cap," and that there "is a plentiful supply of good American players that have limited professional opportunities to play elsewhere."

The court excluded the memo, first, on hearsay grounds, since it was unclear whether an agency relationship existed at the time the memo was drafted and whether its contents were within the scope of the agency, Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(D); and second, on relevance grounds, since the views were not attributable to MLS. On appeal, plaintiffs simply do not respond to the claim that at the time the statement was made, DLJ was an independent contractor and not an agent of MLS. See Merrick v. Farmers Ins. Group, 892 F.2d 1434, 1440 (9th Cir.1990).

In all events, the other documents discussed above which were introduced into evidence contained virtually identical statements penned by MLS itself attesting to MLS's early view that competition in the market was limited. And the DLJ memo, while helpful to players' cause, was hardly dispositive; it addressed only the opportunities of American soccer players and said nothing about the 40% of MLS players who have foreign or dual citizenship and yet are part of plaintiffs' class. By contrast, MLS's own statements which were introduced were more helpful to plaintiffs.

Next, players claim the court erred in permitting a defense witness, Neil Farnsworth, co-owner of a Seattle Division II professional soccer team, to testify that he was competing with MLS for two specific players, while refusing to identify the players by name on "confidentiality" grounds.

At trial, Farnsworth testified that:

> We compete with MLS for players every day. We have a situation right now where I have one player that is > being courted by MLS. He's rejected one offer by MLS now to stay with us.

>
> . . .
> We also have a player from MLS that has played in MLS for probably four years that has contacted us for next season expressing an interest to play for us and then play indoor in addition to playing for us, instead of playing for MLS.

On cross-examination by players' counsel, Farnsworth revealed certain details about the player from his own team, including his salary, but he refused to identify either that player or his MLS recruit by name, claiming he wanted to keep the information confidential. Players' objections were denied; the district court ruled that the players' privacy was at stake, and therefore, that their names were properly excludable under Fed.R.Evid. 403. The court also refused players' request to instruct the jury to ignore the testimony.

Players claim the district court infringed their right to cross-examine Farnsworth and to test the truth of his assertions. To be sure, the court has the authority to "protect witnesses against cross-examination that does little to impair their credibility but that may damage their reputation, invade their privacy, and assault their personality. Rule 403 would permit the protection of even total strangers to the action." 22 Wright & Graham, Federal Practice and Procedure § 5215 (1978) (citation omitted); see Fed.R.Evid. 611(a). But this power is limited to situations in which the probative value of the evidence is "substantially outweighed" by the danger of unfair prejudice. Fed.R.Evid. 403.

Although much discretion resides in the trial judge in striking this balance, Gasperini v. Ctr. for Humanities, Inc., 149 F.3d 137, 143 (2d Cir.1998), the denial of the names certainly limited plaintiffs' ability to cross-examine Farnsworth and it is unclear to us just what substantial privacy interest was at stake: if anything, the players would want to shield their names from MLS, but the league knew whom it was courting from Farnsworth's team and the possible defector presumably would in due course use Farnsworth's overtures in bargaining with MLS.

Nonetheless, even without the names, players were able to test Farnsworth's testimony,[14] and other witnesses—including current and former players and soccer officials—testified to player movement between leagues. For example, Ivan Gazidas, MLS's vice president of operations and player relations, testified at length concerning the competition MLS faced to attract the talents of several named players from other leagues. Farnsworth's anecdotal testimony, while somewhat helpful to MLS, was by no means the most powerful evidence adduced at trial to demonstrate inter-league competition. Accordingly, we find the error was harmless.

Finally, players claim the court erred in admitting in evidence a chart summarizing the testimony of two defense witnesses and later permitting the jury to take the chart with them into the jury room for deliberations. The summary chart listed 67 professional soccer leagues of different divisions from 46 countries; at trial, the two witnesses testified that MLS players had experience in each of the leagues and marked the chart accordingly. Both sides used demonstratives at trial which were admitted into evidence; while players complain generally about the use of the demonstratives, this summary chart is the only item they single out on appeal.

In admitting the summaries, the district court reasoned that the demonstratives would "help the jury to think about a [14] For example, on cross-examination Farnsworth admitted that he could not be certain whether his player had actually ever received an offer from MLS. Similarly, he admitted he could not be sure whether the MLS player he was recruiting actually had an offer to play in MLS the following season.

complex case." At the same time, it recognized the risks involved, see Air Safety v. Roman Catholic Archbishop, 94 F.3d 1, 7 n. 14 (1st Cir.1996), and emphasized in its instructions to the jury that summaries do not "present any independent evidence." It further cautioned them that the summaries are "admitted for your convenience and not to substitute for the full testimony of the witnesses."

It is hard to imagine an issue on which a trial judge enjoys more discretion than as to whether summary exhibits will be helpful. Nothing precludes their use with respect to oral testimony.[15] Here the issues involved in the case and the testimony were complicated and the jury was properly cautioned as to the limited role of summaries. Although the court admitted the charts as "evidence," its instruction made clear that they were merely aids and that the testimony controlled. We find no abuse of discretion and need not concern ourselves with whether, as MLS claims, the objection was somehow waived.

Conspiracy to monopolize. In their third and final section 2 claim, players allege that MLS conspired with the USSF "to prevent any other entity from being sanctioned as a Division I professional soccer league in the United States or otherwise competing against MLS." The court decided that players were required to prove the existence of their relevant market on the conspiracy to monopolize claim; it directed the jury to end its inquiry on all section 2 claims if it found players had failed to prove the existence of their market.

At trial and now on appeal, players say claims of combination or conspiracy to monopolize do not require proof of a relevant market. For these purposes plaintiffs are not distinguishing between the concept of a relevant market and the concepts of monopoly or market power: they are arguing that the prospect that the alleged conspiracy if successful would achieve monopsony power in a real economic market was irrelevant to their claim. Instead, they say they were required to prove only the existence of the conspiracy; an overt act in furtherance of it; and specific intent to monopolize. E.g., Salco Co. v. Gen. Motors Co., 517 F.2d 567, 576 (10th Cir.1975).

Conspiracy to monopolize claims are not often the subject of much attention, since almost any such claim could be proved more easily under section 1's ban on conspiracies in restraint of trade. IIIA Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 809 (1996). However, a majority of courts that have touched the issue have said, in general terms and often without analysis, that proof of a relevant market, and hence, market power, is not required in a conspiracy to monopolize claim. E.g., Salco, 517 F.2d at 576; see IIIA Areeda & Hovenkamp, supra, at ¶ 809 & n. 2 (collecting cases); ABA Sample Jury Instructions in Civil Antitrust Cases, supra, at C-100 n. 3.

On the other side, there are also a number of decisions that say that a relevant market is necessary.[16] That is also the view of the more persuasive commentary, including the most respected of the antitrust treatises. IIIA Areeda & Hovenkamp, supra, at ¶ 809; accord Comment, The Relevant Market Concept in Conspiracy to Monopolize Cases under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 44 U. Chi. L.Rev. 805 (1977). Although we lean toward this view as a general matter, a black or white rule is not inevitable: there may in principle be some cases in which one could argue that a conspiracy claim should be provable without a showing that the alleged market is a real economic market. This case is not among them.

[16] E.g., Doctor's Hosp. of Jefferson, Inc. v. S.E. Med. Alliance, Inc., 123 F.3d 301, 311 (5th Cir.1997); Bill Beasley Farms, Inc. v. Hubbard Farms, 695 F.2d 1341, 1343 (11th Cir.1983); Alexander v. Nat'l Farmers Org., 687 F.2d 1173, 1182 (8th Cir.1982); Joe Westbrook, Inc. v. Chrysler Corp., 419 F.Supp. 824, 845 (N.D.Ga.1976).

Here the "conspiratorial agreement" is a garden variety exclusive dealing arrangement limited to three years. Such agreements are not inherently unlawful; they are judged primarily by considering, in addition to competitive or efficiency justifications, any actual or threatened adverse effects on competition. Tampa Elec. Co., 365 U.S. at 327, 81 S.Ct. 623; U.S. Healthcare, Inc. v. Healthsource, Inc., 986 F.2d 589, 594 (1st Cir.1993). Predicted effects turn, obviously, on the establishment of a market in which the exclusive dealing arrangement may affect prices or competitors. Absent threatened effects, there is normally no basis for condemning an exclusive dealing arrangement.

All implemented exclusive dealing contracts involve both a nominal conspiracy (the agreement) and acts in furtherance (whatever dealings take place). To tell a jury that it may condemn such contracts—without proof of any threatened effect on the market—would create not only confusion for the jury but invite an end run around the threatened effects required by the case law for exclusive dealing under both section 1 and the attempt and monopolization requirements of section 2. IIIA Areeda & Hovenkamp, supra, at ¶ 809.

The point is summed up neatly in the Areeda-Hovenkamp treatise:

> Where the agreements involved would also be held to offend § 1 without the necessity of proving power, the failure to require it for the § 2 conspiracy offense is understandable. However, in those instances where [market] power is a prerequisite to holding an agreement to be an unreasonable restraint of trade—a joint venture, for example—it would make no sense to hold the same agreement offensive to § 2 without proof of > power. To require power under § 1 before condemning a particular agreement is necessarily to say that the arrangement is socially desirable, or at least not harmful, in the absence of power. That policy conclusion cannot sensibly be avoided or negated by the simple trick of calling the agreement a conspiracy to monopolize.

IIIA Areeda & Hovenkamp, supra, at ¶ 809 (emphasis added).

Where parties agree to achieve an admittedly unlawful result, such as a murder or burglary, there is case law to the effect that the prosecutor need not show that the plan was feasible and that impossibility (at least in some situations) is not a defense. 2 LaFave & Scott, Substantive Criminal Law § 6.5(b) (1986); Developments in the Law—Criminal Conspiracy, 72 Harv. L.Rev. 922, 944-45 (1959). This is presumably the source of the antitrust case law relied on by plaintiffs. But the rationale of this classic view is that the conspiracy should be punished because the demonstrated intent to break the law shows that the conspirators are dangerous even if this particular venture was impractical. 2 LaFave & Scott, supra, at § 6.5(b).

Perhaps this view is equally justified in antitrust cases where the evidence shows that the conspirators were aiming at a demonstrably illegal result, say, a world wide monopoly of gold production or a naked horizontal allocation of markets. In our case, there is no dispute that defendants aimed at being the only Division I soccer league in the United States at least for three years and that they enlisted the USSF to achieve this end. But the illegality of such an arrangement is far from clear. To ignore the question whether this is a relevant market in the economic sense is to assume that the end aimed at is illegal. Here, the jury found that control of U.S./Division I soccer would not comprise a monopoly.

In sum, there may be contexts in which the existence vel non of a relevant market is beside the point in a conspiracy to monopolize case, but this case is not one of them. The exclusivity agreement sought by MLS might be unlawful if it threatened adverse competitive effects but not otherwise; and this in turn required proof that someone who was the only purchaser of Division I soccer player services in the United States would control prices in an economic market.

IV. CLAYTON ACT SECTION 7

In their final argument, players say that the district court erred in dismissing their claim that the formation of MLS violated section 7 of the Clayton Act. Count IV of the complaint alleged that, "[i]f not for this combination of assets and purchase of stock, MLS Member Teams would compete with each other for players, like teams in all other major professional sports leagues in the United States." Section 7 prohibits, with certain commerce-related conditions, stock or asset acquisitions whose effect "may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly." 15 U.S.C. § 18.

The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants on the ground that "[t]here can be no § 7 liability because the formation of MLS did not involve the acquisition or merger of existing business enterprises, but rather the formation of an entirely new entity which itself represented the creation of an entirely new market." Fraser, 97 F.Supp.2d at 140. According to the district court:

> The relevant test under § 7 looks to whether competition in existing markets has been reduced. . . . Where there is no existing market, there can be no reduction in the level of competition. There are no negative numbers in this math; there is nothing lower than zero. Competition that does not exist cannot be decreased. The creation of MLS did not reduce competition in an existing market > because when the company was formed there was no active market for Division I professional soccer in the United States.

Id. at 140-41 (citing SCM Corp. v. Xerox Corp., 645 F.2d 1195 (2d Cir.1981)).

Both sides make much of the district court's reference to a "new market." Players say that this contradicts the jury's finding that United States/Division I soccer is not a separate market and, anyway, there is no implied immunity from section 7 for combinations that lessen competition in a new market. Defendants say that the district court merely held the players to the market they themselves alleged and was entitled to do so on summary judgment.

The district court was saying no more than that, after the failure of the NASL and prior to the formation of MLS, there was no enterprise engaged in providing Division I soccer in the United States and thus that a combination that added Division I soccer in this country could hardly reduce competition where none before existed. This is plainly correct insofar as the creation of MLS added a new entrant without subtracting any existing competitors. To this extent, the most common threat addressed by section 7—the merger of two or more entities currently competing with one another, e.g., United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 83 S.Ct. 1715, 10 L.Ed.2d 915 (1963); Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 82 S.Ct. 1502, 8 L.Ed.2d 510 (1962)—is not present in this case.

The Supreme Court has recognized that section 7 also reaches mergers that combine an existing competitor with a potential competitor commonly perceived to be a strong potential entrant where the number of such entrants is limited. United States v. Marine Bancorp., Inc., 418 U.S. 602, 624-25, 94 S.Ct. 2856, 41 L.Ed.2d 978 (1974); United States v. Falstaff Brewing Corp., 410 U.S. 526, 531-32, 93 S.Ct. 1096, 35 L.Ed.2d 475 (1973). In such cases, the notion is that the gobbling up of the "perceived potential entrant" removes an existing constraint on competition and thus reduces present competitive pressure that may currently be constraining price. Falstaff, 410 U.S. at 532, 93 S.Ct. 1096.

The players make no attempt to show that this form of existing competitive constraint was eliminated by the formation of MLS. Rather, their explicit theory is that, if MLS were held unlawful under section 7, its operator/investors would enter the market independently, thus increasing the amount of competition over and above the level provided by MLS itself.

At the outset, the question arises whether section 7 can be used to prevent a merger that itself increases competition where it can be confidently predicted that prevention will or probably will increase competition even more. The classic hypothetical is the merger of an existing competitor with a non-competing company whose interest in entry is unknown and so exerts no current pressure on the market as a perceived potential entrant. Yet when its private files are examined incident to a court suit, plans are discovered for independent entry if the merger is disallowed.

The Supreme Court has expressly reserved the question whether section 7 can be read to reach such a case. Marine Bancorp., 418 U.S. at 639, 94 S.Ct. 2856; Falstaff, 410 U.S. at 537, 93 S.Ct. 1096. To our knowledge only one circuit has expressly applied section 7 so broadly, Yamaha Motor Co. v. FTC, 657 F.2d 971, 978-80 (8th Cir.1981), cert. denied sub nom. Brunswick Corp. v. FTC, 456 U.S. 915, 102 S.Ct. 1768, 72 L.Ed.2d 174 (1982), and the district court apparently rejected this view, Fraser, 97 F.Supp.2d at 141.

It is uncertain how the Supreme Court will ultimately resolve the issue. Plaintiffs' view bumps up against the most straightforward reading of the phrase "may . . . lessen competition" in which "competition" is understood to refer to the existing level of competition prior to the merger in question. Further, it is often hard enough to determine whether a merger will reduce competition in relation to a known baseline, namely, existing market conditions. If a new combination will, as here, initially enhance competition, one might hesitate at a further and even more difficult conjecture that prohibiting the transaction would lead to even more competition further down the line.

On the other hand, the antitrust statutes are not always read literally, as Copperweld itself demonstrates, see also Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 31 S.Ct. 502, 55 L.Ed. 619 (1911) (rule of reason read into restraint of trade). The Antitrust Division, often a significant influence on the development of antitrust case law, seemingly supports a generous reading of Section 7 to embrace so called "actual potential competition." Dep't of Justice Non-Horizontal Merger Guidelines § 4.112, 49 Fed.Reg. 26,824, 26,834 (1984); accord v. Areeda & Turner, Antitrust Law ¶ 1118 (1980). And there might be cases where the facts might compel the conclusion that turning down a pro-competitive merger (compared to the status quo) would produce an even more competitive realignment.

That is not this case. Here, there is no possible way to predict just what would happen if the current version of MLS were precluded. Players assert that, had the operator/investors not formed MLS, they would have entered the market as a traditionally structured league. But as the district court noted, it is "not inevitable that the league would be formed and would operate the same way as previous sports leagues." Fraser, 97 F.Supp.2d at 142. More importantly, it is quite possible these investors would have found the alternative structures unattractive and simply abandoned their effort altogether—hardly a pro-competitive outcome.

Even the alternative result suggested by players—that another, more traditionally structured league like the APSL would have received the Division I sanction instead—appears on the surface no more pro-competitive. The evidence indicates that the APSL was not as well financed or well managed as MLS (hence the USSF's decision to certify MLS and not the APSL), thus increasing the risk that the new Division I league would fail in the long run. In addition, elevating the APSL to Division I status would not necessarily increase competition significantly, since the APSL, an existing minor league, may have already been in the relevant market.

It might be argued that these objections present issues that a jury ought to consider; but there is one final objection that the jury did effectively consider. Even advocates of a broader reading of section 7 concede that striking down a combination that does not threaten present competition could be justified, in the hope of obtaining more competition in the future, only in already concentrated markets. "In the absence of significant market power in the hands of existing firms, . . . the loss through merger of a potential entrant would not affect present or future competition." V Areeda & Turner, supra, ¶ 1119a.

Thus, even on the broader reading of section 7 and allowing room for conjectures about future effects, it would have been necessary for players to prove that MLS operates within a relevant economic market that is presently concentrated. In their section 7 count, the players alleged the same relevant United States/Division I market as in their section 1 and section 2 counts. For reasons already discussed in connection with the section 1 claim, the jury's rejection of this relevant market would also have doomed the section 7 claim based on enhancing future competition if it too had been presented.

Affirmed.

JUDGMENT

WHEREAS, this action was commenced on February 13, 1997, by the filing of a summons and complaint, amended on August 21, 1998, on behalf of the named plaintiffs and a purported class of all those similarly situated (collectively the "Plaintiff Class"); and

WHEREAS, by order dated January 28, 1998, this Court certified a class with respect to plaintiffs' claims for injunctive relief consisting of all players who either have been, are now, or will be under contract to play professional outdoor soccer for defendant Major League Soccer, L.L.C. ("MLS") on an MLS Member Team at any time from February 13, 1997 to the date of final judgment in this action and any appeal therefrom (the "Injunctive Plaintiff Class"); and

Washington Soccer, L.P., Anschutz Chicago Soccer, Inc. and South Florida Soccer, L.P. (the "Investor Defendants") dismissing Counts I and IV of the Complaint as against them; and

WHEREAS, at the close of plaintiffs' case, this Court dismissed Count III of the Complaint pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 50 as against the Investor Defendants; and

WHEREAS, at the close of plaintiffs' case, defendants moved pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 50(a) for judgment as a matter of law dismissing Count III of the Complaint, which motion remained sub judice during the trial, and defendants renewed that motion at the close of the evidence, and this Court having disposed of that motion by Order dated January 19, 2001; and

WHEREAS, following a trial held before a jury in this Court with respect to Count III of the Complaint, a verdict was rendered on December 11, 2000, in favor of defendants MLS and USSF and against both the named plaintiffs and the Injunctive Plaintiff Class; and

WHEREAS, there is no just reason for delaying the entry of final judgment with respect to Counts I, III and IV of the Complaint pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 54(b);

NOW, THERFORE, IT IS ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED, THAT:

1. The claims of the named plaintiffs and the Injunctive Plaintiff Class under Counts I, III and IV of the Complaint are hereby dismissed as against all defendants, with prejudice.

2. The Clerk of the Court shall tax costs with respect to Counts I, III and IV of the Complaint pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 54(d)(1).

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

O'TOOLE, District Judge.

The individual plaintiffs are the representatives of the certified class of professional soccer players who are or who have been employed by the defendant Major League Soccer, L.L.C. ("MLS"). MLS is a limited liability company ("LLC") organized under Delaware law. See generally Del.Code Ann. tit. 6, §§ 18-101, et. seq. (1996). The defendant United States Soccer Federation, Inc. ("USSF") is the national governing body for professional and amateur soccer in the United States.

All the other defendants are investors in MLS, each a capital-contributing member of MLS that has contracted with MLS to operate one or more of MLS's teams.[1]

The plaintiffs assert a number of antitrust claims. In Count I, they allege that MLS and several of its investors who operate MLS teams (hereafter "operator-investors" or "operators") have unlawfully combined to restrain trade or commerce in violation to § 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, by contracting for player services centrally through MLS, effectively eliminating the competition for those services that would take place if each MLS team were free to bid for and sign players directly. In Count II, the plaintiffs assert as a second § 1 claim that all the defendants have conspired to impose anticompetitive "transfer fees" on player relocation that have the effect of restricting the ability of soccer players to move from one team to another, thus dampening competition for players' services worldwide. Count III alleges that all defendants have jointly exercised monopoly power in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2. In Count IV, the plaintiffs allege that the transaction which brought MLS into existence violated § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. Finally, the plaintiffs assert in Count V a California state law claim that certain contracts concerning players' promotional rights were unlawful contracts of adhesion. The plaintiffs seek declaratory and injunctive relief as well as damages.

The plaintiffs have moved for summary judgment as to the defendants' so-called "single entity" defense. (Answer to Am. Compl., First Aff. Def.) The gist of their argument is that although MLS appears to be a single business entity, so that its method of hiring players centrally can be characterized as the act of a single economic actor for antitrust purposes, the organizational form is really just a sham that should be considered ineffective to insulate from condemnation what are in substance illegal horizontal restraints on the hiring of players resulting from the unlawful concerted behavior of the several MLS team operators. The MLS defendants have filed a cross-motion for summary judgment in their favor dismissing Count I, arguing that MLS, as a single entity, cannot commit a § 1 violation. The MLS defendants have also moved for summary judgment on Count IV, the plaintiffs' Clayton Act claim.

I. RELEVANT FACTS

The following material facts are not subject to genuine dispute. At the time MLS was formed, no "Division I" or "premiere" professional outdoor soccer league operated in the United States. The last premiere soccer league to operate in this country had been the North American Soccer League ("NASL"), which led a turbulent existence from 1968 until the mid-1980s, when it collapsed. In 1988, Federation Internationale de Football Association ("FIFA") awarded to the United States the right to host the 1994 World Cup, soccer's illustrious international competition. In consideration for that award, the organizers of the event promised to resurrect premiere professional soccer in the United States.

In the early 1990s, Alan Rothenberg, the President of USSF and of World Cup USA 1994, with assistance from others began developing plans for a Division I professional outdoor soccer league in the United States. Rothenberg and others at the USSF consulted extensively with potential investors in an effort to understand what type of league structure and business plan they might find attractive. He also consulted antitrust counsel in the hope of avoiding the antitrust problems which other sports leagues such as the National Football League ("NFL") had encountered. Eventually the planners settled on the concept of organizing a limited liability company to run the league, and in 1995 MLS was formed.

The structure and mode of operation of MLS is governed by its Limited Liability Company Agreement ("MLS Agreement" or "Agreement"). The MLS Agreement establishes a Management Committee consisting of representatives of each of the investors. The Management Committee has authority to manage the business and affairs of MLS. Several of the investors have signed Operating Agreements with MLS which, subject to certain conditions and obligations, give them the right to operate specific MLS teams.[2] There are also passive investors in MLS who do not operate teams. None of the passive investors is a defendant here.

Operator-investors do not hire players for their respective teams directly. Rather, players are hired by MLS as employees of the league itself and then are assigned to the various teams. Each player's employment contract is between the player and MLS, not between the player and the operator of the team to which the player is assigned. MLS centrally establishes and administers rules for the acquisition, assignment, and drafting of players, and all player assignments are subject to guidelines set by the Management Committee. Among other things, the guidelines limit the aggregate salaries that the league may pay its players.

Under applicable player assignment policies, MLS centrally allocates the top or "marquee" players among the teams, aiming to prevent talent imbalances and assure a degree of comparability of team strength in order to promote competitive soccer matches. These assignments are effective unless disapproved by a two-thirds vote of a subcommittee of the Management Committee. Most of the rest of the players—the non-"marquee" players—are selected for teams by the individual operator-investors through player drafts and the like. The league allows player trades between teams, but

[2] The league itself is authorized by the MLS Agreement to operate teams directly and currently operates two teams (the Dallas Burn and the Tampa Bay Mutiny).

MLS's central league office must approve (and routinely does approve) such trades. Team operators are not permitted to trade players in exchange for cash compensation.

MLS distributes profits (and losses) to its investors in a manner consistent with its charter as a limited liability company, not unlike the distribution of dividends to shareholders in a corporation. Revenues generated by league operations belong directly to MLS. MLS owns and controls all trademarks,[3] copyrights, and other intellectual property rights that relate in any way either to the league or to any of its teams. MLS owns all tickets to MLS games and receives the revenues from ticket sales. There are central league regulations regarding ticket policies, even including limits on the number of complimentary tickets any team may give away. Team operators do retain the ability to negotiate some purely local matters, including local sponsorship agreements with respect to a limited array of products and services and local broadcast agreements, but they do so as agents of MLS.

Under the Operating Agreement, each team operator receives from MLS a management fee. As of the time this action was filed, the management fee consisted of (a) 100% of the first $1.24 million, and 30% of the excess over $1.24 million, of local television broadcast and sponsorship revenues, the latter percentage subject to some specified annual increase; (b) 50% of ticket revenues from home games, increasing to 55% in year six of the league's operation; and (c) 50% of stadium revenues from concessions and other sources.

Expenses are allocated in a way similar to the allocation of revenues. MLS is responsible for most expenses associated with league operations. For example, MLS pays all player acquisition costs, player salaries, and player benefits. It also pays the salaries of all league personnel (including referees), game-related travel expenses for each team, workers' compensation insurance, fees and expenses of foreign teams playing in exhibition games promoted by MLS within the U.S., league-wide marketing expenses, and 50% of each individual team's stadium rental expense.

The team operators are responsible for the other half of their stadium rents, costs of approved local marketing, licensing, and promotion, and general team administration, including salaries of the team's management and coaching staff.

Passive investors do not pay any team operating expenses or receive any management fee. They share in the general distribution of profits (and losses) resulting from league operations.

Team operators cannot transfer their MLS interests or operational rights without the consent of the Management Committee. That consent may be withheld without cause, but the league is required to repurchase the team operator's interest at its fair market value if approval is withheld. Team operators derive whatever rights they may have exclusively from MLS, and the league may terminate these rights if a team operator violates these provisions or fails to act in the best interest of the league.

II. THE MLS MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

I first consider the defendants' motion for summary judgment. Summary judgment may be entered "if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(c). See Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322, 106 S.Ct. 2548, 91 L.Ed.2d 265 (1986). A fact is material if its resolution would "affect the outcome of the suit under the governing law," and a dispute is genuine "if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the non-moving party." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 91 L.Ed.2d 202 (1986). That an antitrust claim may be factually and legally complex does not necessarily preclude the entry of summary judgment; there is no heightened standard for summary judgment in complex cases. See Capital Imaging Assocs. v. Mohawk Valley Med. Assocs., 996 F.2d 537, 541 (2d Cir.1993) (antitrust); City of Mount Pleasant v. Associated Elec. Coop., Inc., 838 F.2d 268, 274 (8th Cir.1988) (same); see also Data Gen. Corp. v. Grumman Sys. Support Corp., 36 F.3d 1147, 1159 (1st Cir.1994) (complex cases generally).

Most of the material facts necessary to decide the defendants' motion are undisputed. One possibly material fact that is disputed is the definition of the relevant market for purposes of the § 1 analysis. In evaluating the defendants' motion, I assume that the relevant market is the market for Division I professional outdoor soccer in the United States, which is the plaintiffs' position. In addition, the plaintiffs are entitled to all reasonable inferences from the undisputed facts.

III. THE OPERATION OF MLS

Section 1 of the Sherman Act forbids contracts, combinations, and conspiracies in restraint of trade or commerce. See 15 U.S.C. § 1. Agreements between separate economic actors that have the effect of substantially and unreasonably reducing competition in a particular market violate § 1. The plaintiffs argue that MLS player policies constitute an unlawful agreement among the various team operators to limit or eliminate competition in the market for players' services.

Though the language of § 1 is sweeping, there are some limits to its reach. One critical limitation for the purposes of this case is that the statute does not prohibit single economic entities from acting unilaterally in ways that may, in some manner, decrease competition. See Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 761, 104 S.Ct. 1464, 79

L.Ed.2d 775 (1984). Because it is directed against contracts, combinations or conspiracies, § 1 only prohibits collective activity by plural economic actors which unreasonably restrains competition. See Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 769, 104 S.Ct. 2731, 81 L.Ed.2d 628 (1984) ("In any conspiracy, two or more entities that previously pursued their own interests separately are combining to act as one for their common benefit."); Mount Pleasant, 838 F.2d at 274 ("A conspiracy requires a plurality of actors. . . ."). The MLS defendants contend that MLS is a "single entity" and that even if its policies and practices have the effect of substantially reducing competition for players' salaries, they do not—cannot as a matter of law—violate § 1.

MLS is a limited liability company organized under Delaware law. An LLC is a form of statutory business organization that combines some of the advantages of a partnership with some of the advantages of a corporation.[4] Under Delaware law, an LLC is a separate legal entity distinct from its members. Del.Code Ann. tit. 6, § 18-201(b). As in a corporation, investors (shareholders in a corporation, members in an LLC) have limited liability (id., § 18-303), own undivided interests in the company's property (§ 18-701), are bound by the terms of their Agreement (like the corporate Articles), and share in the overall profits and losses ratably according to their investment or as otherwise provided by the organizing Agreement (§ 18-503). The Federal Trade Commission has treated LLCs like corporations. See In re Monier Lifetile L.L.C., No. 9290 (F.T.C. Mar. 1999) (characterizing Monier Lifetile as a corporation); In re Merck & Co., No. C-3853 (F.T.C. Feb. 18, 1999) (treating Merck-Medco Managed Care L.L.C., as a corporation); In re Shell Oil Co., No. C-3803 (F.T.C. Apr. 21, 1998) (analyzing joint venture

[4] Both corporations and partnerships are strongly presumed to be single entities for the purposes of § 1. See Philip E. Areeda, Antitrust Law ¶ 1476d (1986).

LLC in same manner as joint venture corporation).[5] In the present context, there is little reason to treat an LLC such as MLS differently from a corporation.

MLS's operations should therefore be analyzed as the operations of a single corporation would be, with its operator-investors treated essentially as officers and shareholders. There can be no § 1 claim based on concerted action among a corporation and its officers, nor among officers themselves, so long as the officers are not acting to promote an interest, from which they would directly benefit, that is independent from the corporation's success. See Copperweld, 467 U.S. at

[5] In addition, some courts have held, in non-antitrust contexts, that LLCs more closely resemble corporations than partnerships. See Exchange Point LLC v. U.S. S.E.C., No. M-30, 1999 WL 386736, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. June 10, 1999) (finding LLC to be more similar to wholly owned corporation than partnership and thus not a person for the purposes of the Right to Financial Privacy Act of 1978); Poore v. Fox Hollow Enterprises, 1994 WL 150872, at *2 (Del.Super.Ct. March 29, 1994) (LLCs sufficiently resemble corporations such that the same rules which require Delaware corporations to retain Delaware counsel to represent them in state courts also apply to LLCs.).

Admittedly, these decisions do not conclusively determine the matter, since the question whether an organization may be liable for a conspiracy in restraint of trade is different from the questions these cases addressed. See Bell Atlantic Bus. Systems Servs. v. Hitachi Data Sys. Corp., 849 F.Supp. 702, 707 (N.D.Cal.1994) ("Plaintiff's attempt to equate [Sherman Act] § 1 conspiracy liability with alter ego liability fails because § 1 deals with federal antitrust policies and the alter ego doctrine is governed by California corporation law. The two legal principles have different purposes and policy considerations."); compare De Castro v. Sanifill, Inc., 198 F.3d 282, 283 (1st Cir.1999) (wholly-owned subsidiary's activities did not confer personal jurisdiction over parent) with Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 753, 104 S.Ct. 2731 (no § 1 liability for parent or wholly-owned subsidiary because the two corporations were a single entity for antitrust purposes).

Nonetheless, the cases do illustrate how courts generally understand the LLC structure to be like that of a corporation and generally apply legal rules applicable to corporations to LLCs as well.

770 n. 15, 104 S.Ct. 2731 (dictum); Greenville Pub. Co. v. Daily Reflector, Inc., 496 F.2d 391, 399-400 (4th Cir.1974) (defendant, a newspaper publishing corporation, was accused of trying to destroy plaintiff's newspaper through predatory pricing; defendant and its president held capable of conspiring under § 1 because president had a stake in a third newspaper which would directly benefit from plaintiff's newspaper's elimination). If an LLC should be considered like a corporation for these purposes, as I conclude it should, then there can be no § 1 violation by reason of concerted action between the LLC as an entity and its members, or between the individual members themselves, unless the members are acting not in the interest of the entity, but rather in their own separate self-interest. The "independent personal stake" exception has not yet been squarely addressed in this Circuit; recognizing the risk that this exception, if left unchecked, might swallow the rule, courts that employ it have done so conservatively. See, e.g., Oksanen v. Page Mem'l Hosp., 945 F.2d 696, 705 (4th Cir.1991) (limiting the scope of the exception to Greenville Publishing's specific rationale); Williams v. 5300 Columbia Pike Corp., 891 F.Supp. 1169, 1174-75 (E.D.Va.1995) ("narrow" exception applies only if officer acted to serve a self-interest entirely independent of corporation's success).[6]

The plaintiffs argue that even if MLS is deemed a single entity, the divergent self-interests of the operator-investors provides sufficient cause to invoke the independent personal stake exception. The plaintiffs base this argument largely on their assertion that the operator-investors do not truly share in MLS's profits and losses. Instead of owning undivided interests in the league that are not attached to the operation of

[6] Egan v. Athol Mem. Hosp., 971 F.Supp. 37 (D.Mass.1997), and Benjamin v. Aroostook Med. Ctr., 937 F.Supp. 957 (D.Me.1996), rejected hospital-physician conspiracy claims similar to the one at issue in Oksanen. Neither case turned on a square assessment and application of the independent personal stake doctrine.

any given team, they pay certain operating expenses individually and receive management fees from MLS that are calculated in large part according to their local team-generated revenues. Also, they are able to harvest the value of the particular teams they operate by selling their operational rights or, if the Management Committee vetoes the sale, by requiring the league to pay them the fair market value of their investment.

The management fee arrangement exists in addition to, not in place of, the overall profit and loss sharing specified in the Agreement. Indeed, the fact that there are passive investors in MLS is strong evidence that the payment of management fees and assignment of local expenses do not account for all economic risks and benefits associated with the league's operation.

Furthermore, successful local operation of a team benefits the entire league. The league's net revenues, not just the local operator's management fees, increase when more local revenues are generated.[7] [7] Any number of businesses, from restaurants to car dealerships to law firms, require their employees and agents to individually assume certain operational costs and reward them with commissions directly tied to individual performance. That such arrangements may reflect incomplete unity of interest is immaterial, see Chicago Professional Sports, 95 F.3d at 598 (Complete unity of interest test "would be silly. Even a single firm contains many competing interests."). One would be hard pressed to say that this rather routine business practice scrambles the economic interests within the firm in such a way as to open it up to § 1 scrutiny. See Siegel Transfer, Inc. v. Carrier Express, Inc., 54 F.3d 1125, 1135 (3d Cir.1995) (company in charge of freight broker's day-to-day operations was paid on percentage of broker's revenue; held that this encouraged efficient operation and made broker and operations company inseparable for § 1 purposes); Coast Cities Truck Sales v. Navistar Int'l Transp. Co., 912 F.Supp. 747, 765 (D.N.J.1995) (truck manufacturer and associated dealerships were single entity even though each dealership operator received bonus tied to dealership's individual performance).

A similar effect is foreseeable in the market for operator-investor shares. Admittedly, unlike undifferentiated shares of stock, the market value of a team operator's investment will not simply reflect an aliquot share of the whole enterprise, but will also reflect in certain respects the success of the local operation. Nonetheless, unlike competition in most markets, where the value of an enterprise would usually be enhanced if its competitors grew weaker, the value of the right to operate an MLS team would be diminished, not enhanced, by the weaknesses of other teams, their operators, and the league as a whole. Management fees and operational rights notwithstanding, every operator-investor has a strong incentive to make the league—and the other operator-investors—as robust as possible. Each operator-investor's personal stake is not independent of the success of MLS as a whole enterprise.

The plaintiffs point to other ways in which the operator-investors compete on and off the field. That teams (and, by extension, their operators) compete playing soccer, and that operators directly hire certain staff, such as coaches, to make teams more capable of on-field heroics, does nothing to assist the plaintiffs.[8] Exciting on-field competition between teams is what makes MLS games worth watching. Cf. Chicago Professional Sports, 95 F.3d at 598-99 ("a league with one team would be like one hand clapping"). Game competition, without doubt, is part of the league's entertainment product, not an indicator of divergent economic interests among operators.

On balance, the business organization of MLS is quite centralized. The league owns the teams themselves; dis-

[8] Giving operators discretion over certain aspects of their duties while withholding it in other areas does not itself reflect disunity of interest. See Williams v. I.B. Fischer, 794 F.Supp. 1026, 1031 (D.Nev.1992) (franchiser and franchisees held to be single entity for purposes of restraint on poaching other franchisees' managers; franchisees' control over local pricing decisions did not establish lack of unity of interest).

gruntled operators may not simply "take their ball and go home" by withdrawing the teams they operate and forming or joining a rival league. MLS also owns all intellectual property related to the teams. It contracts for local-level services through its operators, who act on its behalf as agents.[9] Operators risk losing their rights to operate their teams if they breach the governing Agreement. The Management Committee exercises supervisory authority over most of the league's activities. It may reject, without cause, any operator's individual attempt to assign the rights to operate a team.

It is true that MLS is run by a Management Committee that can be controlled by the operator-investors, who constitute the majority of the members of the Committee. It is not remarkable that principal investors can collectively control the governing board of an LLC (or of a corporation). That fact hardly proves that the investors are pursuing economic interests separate from the interests of the firm. The notion that the members of the Management Committee of a single firm violate the antitrust laws when they vote together to maximize the price or minimize the cost of the firm's product is easily rejected.

As a factual matter, therefore, there is insufficient basis in the record for concluding that operators have divergent economic interests within MLS's structure. Even if one draws the most favorable inference on the plaintiffs' behalf, there is no reasonable basis for imposing § 1 liability.

MLS's player policies, in particular, do not call for application of the independent personal stake exception. The [9] The plaintiffs argue that the operators, since they sit on MLS's Management Committee, are not MLS agents in this regard. That argument fails. Shareholders—even ones in positions of control—are not disqualified from serving as an agent of the corporation, see, e.g., Ed Peters Jewelry Co. v. C & J Jewelry Co., 124 F.3d 252, 275 (1st Cir.1997).

operator-investors benefit from those policies because centralized contracting for player services results in lower salaries. However, that benefit is, in the MLS structure, a derivative one. No operator has an individual player payroll to worry about; the league pays the salaries. Moreover, the MLS investor gets the lower-cost benefit in exchange for having surrendered the degree of autonomy that team owners in "plural entity" leagues typically enjoy. The reason an individual team owner in one of those other leagues is willing to bid up players' salaries to get the particular players it wants is because by paying high salaries to get desirable players, the owner can achieve other substantial benefits, such as increased sales of tickets and promotional goods, media revenues, and the like. The MLS operator-investors have largely yielded that opportunity to the central league office. Plainly, there are trade-offs in the different approaches. The MLS members have calculated that the surrender of autonomy, together with the attendant benefit of lower and more controlled player payrolls and greater parity in talent among teams, will help MLS to succeed where others, notably NASL, failed. That is a calculation made on behalf of the entity, and it does not serve only the ulterior interests of the individual investors standing on their own. It is not an occasion for application of the independent personal stake exception to the general single-entity rule described in Copperweld.

The plaintiffs also argue that the structure of MLS is a sham designed to allow what is actually an illegal combination of plural actors to masquerade as the business conduct of a single entity. The plaintiffs do not argue that the structure of MLS as established by the its organizing Agreement is legally defective so that it should not be recognized as a lawful entity under Delaware law. Rather, they say that even if MLS is a legitimate LLC—a legitimate single entity for state law purposes—a court should disregard that legal form in evaluating under antitrust principles whether the operator—investors are engaged in a horizontal restraint in the market for players' services. To make the argument, the plaintiffs put a reverse spin on the Copperweld holding.

Copperweld held that a corporation could not conspire with its wholly owned subsidiary in violation of § 1 because, though the parent and subsidiary were distinct legal entities, the economic reality was that they functioned as a single business enterprise. Cases following Copperweld have mainly addressed the question whether to disregard formal distinctions among entities in order to find economic singularity for the purposes of § 1. See, e.g., Sullivan v. NFL, 34 F.3d 1091, 1099 (1st Cir.1994) (NFL, composed of separately owned clubs, not a single entity in the market for ownership of teams);[10] Chicago Professional Sports Ltd. Partnership v. NBA, 95 F.3d 593, 597-600 (7th Cir.1996) (characterizing NBA, composed of separately owned clubs, as a single entity for the purpose of league-wide limitations on locally televising games through "superstations," though expressly withholding judgment as to whether NBA was single entity in other markets, such as player contracting); Oksanen, 945 F.2d at 703 (hospital's engagement of legally-distinct medical staff in peer review process not actionable under § 1 because hospital and doctors were behaving as [10] The plaintiffs rely heavily on Sullivan, which rejected the NFL's argument that its teams had sufficient unity of interest to make the league a single entity under Copperweld. Sullivan does little to aid the plaintiffs because the NFL, despite certain similarities, is fundamentally different from MLS. The NFL is a confederation fused from agreements among preexisting, independently owned teams; unlike MLS, NFL football clubs do not exist as part of an overarching corporate structure. As explained in the text infra, MLS cannot be subjected to the wide- ranging analysis of economic interests that has been applied to the NFL. United States Football League v. NFL, 842 F.2d 1335 (2d Cir.1988); Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum Comm'n v. NFL, 726 F.2d 1381 (9th Cir.1984); and North American Soccer League v. NFL, 670 F.2d 1249 (2d Cir.1982), are distinguishable for the same reason.

single entity in that context); Mount Pleasant, 838 F.2d at 276-77 (electric cooperative composed of legally distinct providers held to be single entity); Seabury Management, Inc. v. Professional Golfers' Ass'n of Am., Inc., 878 F.Supp. 771, 777 (D.Md.1994) (PGA and partially owned regional golf association were, collectively, a single entity); cf. Brown v. Pro Football, Inc., 518 U.S. 231, 248-49, 116 S.Ct. 2116, 135 L.Ed.2d 521 (1996) (in collective-bargaining context, the NFL looks "more like a single bargaining employer").

The plaintiffs propose that the "economic reality" test should be applied not only to ignore formal legal distinctions between separate corporations as the court did in Copper weld, but conversely to envision distinctions in what is formally a single legal entity when doing so would accurately describe how the business of the entity actually operates. The argument may have some superficial appeal, but on close examination it appears that it rests on a misconception of the scope of the Copperweld principle.

It was noted above that the courts have not given the sweeping language of § 1 its broadest possible effect. The "rule of reason" is an obvious example of a limitation on the literal scope of the statutory language. See Board of Trade of City of Chicago v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238, 38 S.Ct. 242, 62 L.Ed. 683 (1918) (Brandeis, J.) ("[T]he legality of an agreement or regulation cannot be determined by so simple a test, as whether it restrains competition. Every agreement concerning trade, every regulation of trade, restrains. To bind, to restrain, is of their very essence").

The Copperweld rule similarly limits the reach of the statute's broad language. While concerted action between two separate corporations, one the parent and the other a subsidiary, could literally be described as a "combination" that restrains trade, the Supreme Court concluded that it was not the kind of combination that § 1 was intended to forbid. Like the coordination between a corporation and its unincorporated division, an agreement between a parent and its subsidiary did not represent "a sudden joining of two independent sources of economic power previously pursuing separate interests." Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 770, 104 S.Ct. 2731. The plaintiffs are correct that the Court was looking to substance, not merely form.

But that does not mean that form is irrelevant. Copperweld does not support the proposition that a business organized as a single legal entity should have its form ignored, or its "veil" pierced, so that courts could examine whether participants in the firm have conducted concerted activity that would violate § 1. Merely posing that proposition suggests how troublesome it would be as a practical matter. It would permit the atomization of firms into their constituent parts, then to have the relationships of those parts examined to see if they produced anticompetitive effects that, had they been brought about by independent economic actors, would have violated § 1. The number of companies that could be vulnerable to examination of internal business decisions under such an approach would be mind-boggling. No case has suggested that it would be appropriate to deconstruct a corporate entity in that way.

Practical objections aside, the theory is also fundamentally incompatible with the axiom the Copperweld Court's analysis started with—that coordination of business activities within a single firm is not subject to scrutiny under § 1. Copperweld cannot be understood to authorize an "economic reality" analysis that would require rejection of the very premise the holding of the case depended on. Moreover, the plaintiffs' proposition would plainly interfere with the objective of the antitrust laws. "Subjecting a single firm's every action to judicial scrutiny for reasonableness would threaten to discourage the competitive enthusiasm that the antitrust laws seek to promote." Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 775, 104 S.Ct. 2731.

In sum, the plaintiffs' deconstruction efforts are unavailing. MLS is what it is. As a single entity, it cannot conspire or combine with its investors in violation of § 1, and its investors do not combine or conspire with each other in pursuing the economic interests of the entity. MLS's policy of contracting centrally for player services is unilateral activity of a single firm. Since § 1 does not apply to unilateral activity—even unilateral activity that tends to restrain trade [11]—the claim set forth in Count I cannot succeed as a matter of law.

IV. THE FORMATION OF MLS

In addition to the claim that the player policies of MLS are an unlawful horizontal restraint of trade, the plaintiffs also claim that the very formation of MLS in the first place violated § 7 of the Clayton Act, which prohibits acquisitions or mergers the effect of which "may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly" in any line of commerce or activity affecting commerce, 15 U.S.C. § 18, as well as § 1 of the Sherman Act. The two theories are related.

A. The Clayton Act Claim

1. Antitrust Injury

Only those who have sustained injuries which the antitrust laws were designed to prevent may sue under§ 7 of the Clayton Act. See Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, [11] See Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 776, 104 S.Ct. 2731 ("The appropriate inquiry . . . is not whether the coordinated conduct of a parent and its wholly owned subsidiary may ever have anticompetitive effects. . . . Nor is it whether the term 'conspiracy' will bear a literal construction that includes parent corporations and their wholly owned subsidiaries. For if these were the proper inquiries, a single firm's conduct would be subject to § 1 scrutiny whenever the coordination of two employees was involved. Such a rule would obliterate the Act's distinction between unilateral and concerted conduct, contrary to the clear intent of Congress, as interpreted by the weight of judicial authority").

Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S.Ct. 690, 50 L.Ed.2d 701 (1977); see also Philip E. Areeda, Antitrust Violations Without Damage Recoveries, 89 Harv. L.Rev. 1127, 1130-37 (1976). The defendants' first response to the § 7 claim is that the plaintiffs cannot establish an antitrust injury resulting from the formation of MLS. In making this argument, the defendants rely primarily on Alberta Gas Chemicals Ltd. v. E.I. Du Pont De Nemours and Co., 826 F.2d 1235, 1242-43 (3d Cir.1987).

Alberta Gas emphasizes the lesson that the antitrust laws provide remedies only for injury to competition itself, and not simply injury to competitors. A competitor adversely affected by a transaction that does not actually reduce the level of competition in the relevant market has no remedy under the antitrust laws. If the transaction defeats a competitor's expectations about how the market will evolve, but does not reduce the overall level of competition in the market in some manner injurious to the disappointed competitor, the dashed hopes are not a sufficient basis for an antitrust lawsuit. In Brunswick, for example, several independent bowling alley owners sued Brunswick for acquiring and then revitalizing their once-ailing competitors. While these acquisitions thwarted a potentially advantageous market consolidation anticipated by the independent alley owners, there was no injury to competition itself. In fact, the revitalization of former competitors caused an increase in competition, and it was actually the prospect of greater competition which threatened to injure the plaintiffs. That was not an antitrust injury. See Brunswick, 429 U.S. at 488, 97 S.Ct. 690.

The principle is not entirely apt here. The plaintiffs are not simply suing on dashed hopes of a windfall, as the plaintiffs in Brunswick were. The new Division I soccer league the World Cup promoters promised to create could have been structured in the same way other sports leagues had been structured: a number of independently owned teams collaborating in certain aspects but competing with one another for player services. Clearly, compared to this traditional form of sports league, MLS's structure reduces competition for player services. The claim does assert an injury to competition cognizable under the antitrust laws.

2. Existing Market

Unfortunately for the plaintiffs, the claim is not otherwise viable. There can be no § 7 liability because the formation of MLS did not involve the acquisition or merger of existing business enterprises, but rather the formation of an entirely new entity which itself represented the creation of an entirely new market. The relevant test under § 7 looks to whether competition in existing markets has been reduced. See Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320-22, 82 S.Ct. 1502, 8 L.Ed.2d 510 (1962) (§ 7 is a means for preventing the reduction of competition in existing markets); SCM Corp. v. Xerox Corp., 645 F.2d 1195, 1210-11 (2d Cir.1981) (dismissing plaintiff's claim that acquisition of plain paper copying patents was a § 7 violation because, at the time of the acquisition, no market existed for plain paper copying). Where there is no existing market, there can be no reduction in the level of competition. There are no negative numbers in this math; there is nothing lower than zero. Competition that does not exist cannot be decreased. The creation of MLS did not reduce competition in an existing market because when the company was formed there was no active market for Division I professional soccer in the United States.

The plaintiffs try two avenues around this obstacle to their claim. First, they argue that § 7 is designed to arrest anti-competitive transactions in their incipiency, see United States v. Penn-Olin Chem. Co., 378 U.S. 158, 171, 84 S.Ct. 1710, 12 L.Ed.2d 775 (1964), so that it must apply not only to transactions that reduce existing competition, but includes also those transactions intended to stifle reasonably anticipated "potential competition." See Tenneco, Inc. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 689 F.2d 346, 352 (2d Cir.1982); Yamaha Motor Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 657 F.2d 971, 977-78 (8th Cir.1981).

The plaintiffs' reliance on the potential competition doctrine as explained in Penn-Olin and Yamaha is misplaced. In Penn-Olin, a vertical joint venture between two major participants in the sodium chlorate market was held to be subject to § 7 scrutiny. Similarly, in Yamaha, the Eighth Circuit applied § 7 to evaluate a proposed venture between the country's second largest seller of outboard motors and a major foreign producer that had not yet sold products here but had the ability to do so and concluded that the potential anticompetitive results of the venture were impermissible. In both cases, there was an existing, established relevant market, and the asserted violation was the preemption of likely competition in that market by the anticipatory acquisition of the potential competitors. The businesses already existed; it was the competition between them that was only "potential." Indeed, Yamaha cautions that the potential competition doctrine is limited to "acquisitions by a large firm in an oligopolistic market, if the acquisition eliminate[s] the acquired firm as a potential competitor, and if the acquired firm would otherwise have been expected to enter the relevant market de novo." Yamaha 657 F.2d at 977. Accord Tenneco, 689 F.2d at 352 (characterizing actual potential competitor doctrine as barring mergers that might increase oligopolistic behavior in existing markets). In the present case, both the market for Division I professional soccer in the United States and the existence of any competitors in that market were only "potential" until the transaction that formed MLS occurred. The "potential competition" doctrine does not apply in these circumstances.

The plaintiffs further argue that, even though no one was playing Division I soccer in the United States at the time MLS was created, the market nevertheless existed because the World Cup promoters had promised FIFA that a premiere soccer league would be established in the United States. As a result of the promise, they say, it was inevitable that there would be such a league. The operator-investors in MLS, therefore, would likely have been competitors in a traditional soccer sports league. The formation of MLS thwarted that prospective competition, violating § 7.

The expected market for Division I professional soccer in the United States at the time MLS was formed was much like the plain paper copying market when the relevant transactions in the SCM case occurred: it was foreseeable, perhaps even inevitable, but simply not yet in existence. As in SCM, here too the conclusion must be that MLS's formation is not actionable under § 7. The plaintiffs' attempt to distinguish SCM as an artifact of the occasionally tortured relationship between antitrust and patent law is not convincing. The SCM court explicitly allowed that the acquisition of patents, like other assets, could form the basis of § 7 liability. The court observed:

> The existing market provides the framework in which the probability and extent of an adverse impact upon competition may be measured. . . . [I]t would have been impossible to examine the effects of the [patent purchase] upon the relevant product market and sub-market . . . because those markets did not come into being until [after the purchase].

SCM, 645 F.2d at 1211.

More fundamentally, the flaw in the plaintiffs' existence-by-inevitability argument is that the inevitability of a professional soccer league is not the same as the inevitability of multiple competitors. Granting that there would inevitably be a league, it was not inevitable that the league would be formed and would operate the same way as previous sports leagues. See Areeda, ¶ 1478d, at 358-59 (1986) (proposing a "Hypothetical Football League" that resembles MLS and differs from historical leagues). By its very existence MLS has shown that a sports league can be organized differently, at least when it comes to existence by creation and not by evolution.

The defendants are entitled to judgment in their favor on the Clayton Act claim.

B. The Sherman Act Claim

In addition to the Clayton Act theory, the plaintiffs urge that the formation of MLS, by which multiple operator-investors combined to create the single entity, also violated the Sherman Act's prohibition of contracts, combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade.

It is generally held that a coming together that does not violate § 7 of the Clayton Act does not violate § 1 of the Sherman Act either. See White Consol. Industries v. Whirlpool Corp., 781 F.2d 1224, 1228 (6th Cir.1986) (failure to show Clayton § 7 violation precluded Sherman § 1 violation for same conduct). A merger of market participants that does not lessen competition and thus does not offend § 7 ordinarily would not constitute a combination in restraint of trade in violation of § 1. Though the statutory provisions present slightly different modes of analysis, when those modes are applied to the same constellation of facts, the answer will ordinarily be the same.

Here, the pertinent facts are that the founding investors of MLS created both a new company and simultaneously a new market, in effect increasing the number of competitors from zero to one. As explained above, that did not represent a lessening of actual or potential competition in an existing market. Similarly, it did not represent a "sudden joining of . . . independent sources of economic power previously pursuing separate interests," see Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 770, 104 S.Ct. 2731, which is what is forbidden by § 1.

V. CONCLUSION AND ORDER

For all the reasons set forth above, the defendants' motion for summary judgment in their favor under Counts I and IV of the Amended Complaint is GRANTED. It follows that the plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment on the defendants' "single entity" defense is DENIED.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

VERDICT ON SPECIAL QUESTIONS TO THE JURY

O'TOOLE, D.J.

I. The Relevant Market

1. Have the plaintiffs established that the relevant geographic market for this action is the market in the United States of America?

Yes _____ No _____

2. Have the plaintiffs established that the relevant services market in this action is of Division I professional soccer and does not include other professional soccer leagues or teams, such as Division II, Division III, or indoor soccer?

Yes _____ No _____

If your answer to both Question 1 and Question 2 is NO proceed no further. The foreman should sign the verdict form and notify the court.

II. Monopolization

3. Have the plaintiffs established that Major League Soccer, L.L.C. possesses monopoly power in the relevant market as you have defined that market in response to Questions 1 and 2?

Yes _____ No _____

If your answer to Question 3 is NO proceed to Question 7, and do not answer Questions 4, 5 or 6.

4. Have the plaintiffs established that Major League Soccer, L.L.C. willfully acquired or maintained monopoly power in the relevant market as you have defined that market in response to Questions 1 and 2 by anticompetitive or exclusionary means without legitimate business justification, or for anticompetitive or exclusionary purposes, rather than as a result of a superior product, business acumen, or historical accident?

Yes _____ No _____

If your answer to Question 4 is NO proceed to Question 7, and do not answer Questions 5 or 6.

5. Have the plaintiffs established that the members of the plaintiff class were injured or threatened with injury in their business or property as a result of Major League Soccer, L.L.C.'s monopolization of the relevant market as you have defined it?

Yes _____ No _____

6. Have the plaintiffs established that any or all of the named plaintiffs were injured in their business or property as a result of Major League Soccer, L.L.C.'s monopolization of the relevant market?

III. Attempt to Monopolize

7. Have the plaintiffs established that Major League Soccer, L.L.C. had a specific intent to achieve monopoly power in the relevant market as you have defined that market in response to Questions 1 and 2 through the use of anticompetitive or exclusionary means?

Yes _____ No _____

If your answer to Question 7 is NO proceed to Question 11, and do not answer Questions 8 through 10.

8. Have the plaintiffs established the existence of a dangerous probability of success that Major League Soccer, L.L.C. would achieve monopoly power in the relavant market as you have defined it?

Yes _____ No _____

If your answer to Question 8 is NO proceed to Question 11, and do not answer Questions 9 or 10.

9. Have the plaintiffs established that the members of the plaintiff class were injured or threatened with injury in their business or property as a result of Major League Soccer, L.L.C.'s attempt to monopolize the relevant market as you have defined it?

Yes _____ No _____

10. Have the plaintiffs established that any or all of the named plaintiffs were injured in their business or property as a result of Major League Soccer, L.L.C.'s attempt to monopolize the relevant market as you have defined it?

IV. Combination or Conspiracy to Monopolize

11. Have the plaintiffs established that Major League Soccer, L.L.C. and the United States Soccer Federation knowingly formed an agreement or came to a mutual understanding with the specific intent of acquiring or maintaining monopoly power in the relevant market as you have defined that market in response to Questions 1 and 2?

Yes _____ No _____

If your answer to Question 11 is NO proceed to Question 15, and do not answer Questions 12 through 14.

12. Have the plaintiffs established that overt action was taken in furtherance of such agreement or mutual understanding between Major League Soccer, L.L.C. and the United States Soccer Federation to monopolize the relevant market as you have defined it?

Yes _____ No _____

If your answer to Question 12 is NO proceed to Question 15, and do not answer Questions 13 or 14.

13. Have the plaintiffs established that the members of the plaintiff class were injured or threatened with injury in their business or property as a result of a combination or conspiracy to monopolize the relevant market as you have defined it on the part of Major League Soccer, L.L.C. and the United States Soccer Federation?

Yes _____ No _____

4. Elements of Monopolization Claim

In their first claim against MLS, plaintiffs allege that MLS has engaged in unlawful monopolization in the market for the services of major league (Division I) professional soccer players in the United States.

To prove a monopoly claim under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, a plaintiff must prove both that the defendant possessed monopoly power in the relevant market and that the defendant acquired or maintained that monopoly power willfully through the use of anticompetitive or exclusionary means, as distinguished from acquiring or maintaining it by reason of the growth or development of business because of a superior product, skillful business decisions, or historical accident. In other words, the two fundamental propositions necessary to prove a claim of monopolization are the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and the deliberate or willful acquisition or maintenance of that power by anticompetitive or exclusionary means.

It is important to take note that the question is not whether the defendant actually exercised its monopoly power; the plaintiffs need only prove that the defendants acquired or maintained monopoly power through anticompetitive or exclusionary behavior.

So, to succeed on this claim, the plaintiffs must prove the following elements by a preponderance of the evidence:

First, that MLS possesses monopoly power in the relevant market;

Second, that MLS acquired or maintained that power willfully through anticompetitive or exclusionary conduct; and Third, that plaintiffs were injured in their business or property because of such monopolization.

It is necessary for me do [sic] define more precisely for you some of the key concepts in those propositions. First, what does it mean to have monopoly power in a relevant market? Second, how do we determine what is a relevant market? Third, what does it mean to acquire or maintain monopoly power willfully through anticompetitive or exclusionary conduct? Finally, what needs to be shown to establish an injury to business or property?

5. Monopoly Power

Monopoly power is the power to dominate or control a market for goods or services. Monopoly power is the power either to control prices or to exclude competition from the relevant market.

Let me explain that briefly. In a competitive market, any one firm that raises the price for its product above competitive levels will lose customers who prefer to buy a similar product from another supplier whose price is lower because it is at a competitive level. If a firm has monopoly power, however, it may be able to raise its price without losing customers, because there are not competitors to whom the customers can turn for a satisfactory, lower-priced substitute for the monopolist's product. In this circumstance, the customers end up paying higher prices, not because the monopolist's product is any better, but because of the absence of competition.

Similarly, a firm possessing monopoly power may be able to use that power to prevent potential new competitors from entering the market and offering competing products which would introduce actual competition that would tend to bring the monopolist's price down. .The possession of monopoly power might permit a firm to create effective barriers that would prevent or discourage new firms from entering into competition with it.

In this case, we are talking about what the economists call "monopsony power." Monopsony power is defined exactly the same way monopoly power is defined. The only difference is that the term monopoly is used to describe a seller of goods and services, while the term monopsony is used to describe a buyer of goods or services.

MLS is a buyer of player services, and the plaintiffs allege that it has monopsony or monopoly power in the labor market. Of course, when the firm alleged to have monopoly power in a market as a buyer of services, the power to control prices is the power to pay lower than competitive wages for the services being acquired without having the sellers of those services—the players—turn to another league or team for employment.

Finding that a firm possessed monopoly power does not require you to find that it exercised that power. The first element of the claim for monopolization refers only to the possession of monopoly power. Whether it was abused or to what effect will be considered in connection with other elements that we will address shortly.

6. Relevant Market Generally

Whether a firm possesses monopoly power is determined not in the abstract but by reference to a particular area of commerce. This is usually referred to as the relevant market, that is, the economic market for goods or services in which the firm participates as a buyer or seller. There is no general definition that works for all cases. Rather, in each case, the determination of the relevant market must be made by assessment of all the pertinent factors present in the particular case under consideration, as shown by the evidence.

There are two aspects or dimensions of the relevant market. One dimension describes the relevant market in terms of what it is that is being bought or sold. In cases involving the sale of goods, this is usually called the product market. In this case, involving the purchase of the services of soccer players, we might call it the services market. The other aspect or dimension is the geographical reach of the market.

Here, the parties dispute both aspects of the relevant market—both the scope of the services market and the scope of the geographic market.

In substance, with respect to both aspects, the fundamental question is, what is the scope of effective competition for the services in question?

7. Relevant Services Market

The plaintiffs assert that the relevant services market is the market for the services of major league (Division I) professional outdoor soccer players. The defendants disagree that this is the appropriate definition, saying that the services market includes not only Division I professional outdoor soccer, but also Division II, Division III, and indoor soccer leagues or teams.

As this difference indicates, controversies about the scope of a product or services market are controversies about how broadly or narrowly it is defined. That depends on what the evidence shows you about how decisions are made as a practical matter by buyers and sellers of the product or services in issue.

A key concept is the concept of "substitutability". In a product market, for example, product A may be said to be in the same market as product B if buyers of the product A would generally accept product B as a reasonable substitute for product A if they choose not to buy product A because its seller has raised its price. Translating to a services market in a monopsony case, different employers may be said to be within the same labor or services market if persons employed by one employer will generally seek employment from another employer if the first employer lowers the wage it offers to pay.

The parties will argue to you why you should consider the relevant services market to be, as the plaintiff contends, the market for outdoor Division I soccer only, or, alternately, why you should consider it to be broader than that, as the defendants contend. It will be up to you to resolve that issue on the evidence. Remember the basic point of the inquiry is to determine the scope of effective competition for professional soccer players' services.

8. Relevant Geographic Market

The relevant geographic market is the geographic area within which there is effective competition for the services at issue.

The plaintiffs contend that the relevant geographic market for this case is the market for players' services within the United States. The defendants contend that the geographic market is not limited to the United States, but encompasses other areas as well, such as Europe and Latin America.

Again, the concept of "substitutability" may help you here. You might ask yourselves what the geographic area is within which professional soccer players employed by MLS can reasonably find substitute employment with other employers. The relevant geographic market may be considered the geographic area within which MLS faces competition and to which players can turn, as a practical matter, for alternate opportunities for employment as professional soccer players.

9. Individual Preferences as a Factor in Determining Relevant Market

As I have said, determining the scope or extent of the relevant market for the purposes of measuring a firm's power to control prices or exclude competition in that market requires careful assessment and evaluation of all the circumstances shown in the evidence that may bear on the question. It is a question that must be answered on the particular and peculiar facts of each case.

One of the factors you may consider is the preferences of buyers and sellers, as indicated by the way they actually behave. But individual preferences are not by themselves determinative if the circumstances indicate that as a practical matter economic decisions are made on the basis of other factors as well. Thus, if you find that American players prefer to play in the United States and prefer not to play in Europe, or that that [sic] players would prefer to play at a Division I level, rather than Division II or III, or prefer to play outdoor, rather than indoor, soccer, then you may take those matters into account as you consider the scope of the relevant market.

But such preferences, if you find they exist, are not automatically determinative, to the exclusion of other pertinent factors, in establishing the limits of the services or geographic markets. You might find, for example, that despite the existence of such preferences, players will in fact seek and accept employment alternatives that are not their first preference. In that case, the scope of the relevant market would be defined by what actually occurs, rather than by what preferences might be expressed.

In defining the relevant market for the purposes of a claim of monopolization, the question always remains the scope of effective economic competition.

10. "Input" and "Output" Markets

Another distinction between kinds of markets that you may need to consider in your deliberations is the distinction between an "input" market and an "output" market.

In economic terms, "inputs" are goods and services that a firm buys in order to use them in turn to produce other goods or services that the firm will sell. So, as a classic illustration, raw materials are "inputs" to a finished product. The manufacturer purchases the raw materials and uses them to produce the finished product it will sell. Labor employed in manufacturing the finished product also amounts to an "input."

On the other hand, the finished product that is manufactured using labor and raw materials is the firm's "output."

A firm purchases or acquires labor and materials for the production of its own products or services in what is called the "input" market, and sells its finished products or services in what is called the "output" market.

In this case, the players' services are an input to the MLS output, which is professional outdoor soccer matches. The compensation that MLS pays its players is determined in the input market – that is, the labor market for players' services. It is this input market that the players contend has been monopolized by MLS.

Although you are asked to decide whether MLS has monopolized the "input" market, you may take into consideration what occurs in the "output" market in determining whether the plaintiffs have proved that the conduct of MLS lacked legitimate business justification, such as increasing competition in the output market.

* * * *

13. Single Entity Structure

As you have heard, MLS was formed as a single company, and many of its business decisions, including those related to the hiring and compensation of player, are made centrally by the league, rather than by individual teams, as may be the case in other sports.

I remind you, as I had occasion to instruct you in the course of the trial, that it was lawful for MLS to have organized itself in the way it did. You may not consider the decision to organize the league as a single firm as a decision that lacked legitimate business justification as you consider whether the plaintiffs have proved the acquisition or maintenance of monopoly power through anticompetitive or exclusionary means.

* * * *

19. Conspiracy to Monopolize

The first two claims I have described for you are asserted only against MLS. The plaintiffs assert their third claim, for combination or conspiracy to monopolize, against both MLS and the USSF.

The establish this claim, the plaintiffs must prove each of the following propositions by a preponderance of the evidence:

First, that there was an agreement between two or more persons to achieve or maintain a monopoly within the relevant market;

Second, that defendants conspired, combined or otherwise entered into that agreement with the specific intention or purpose of achieving such a monopoly;

Third, that one or more of the defendants committed an overt act in furtherance of the combination or conspiracy;

Fourth, that the plaintiffs were injured in their business or property as a result of the combination or conspiracy to monopolize.

Most of these terms I have defined, and I will not repeat those definitions. There are two matters unique to the claim of conspiracy to monopolize that you must understand.

Relevant Market

If monopoly power exists, it must be found to exist within an economically meaningful market, or what is called a relevant market.

Defining the relevant labor market is essential because you are required to make a judgment about whether MLS has the requisite monopoly power to control wages or exclude competition. To do so, you should consider whether any effective competition significantly restrains MLS's ability to control wages for its players.

There are two aspects you must consider in defining a relevant market. The first is the relevant geographic market; the second is the relevant product or services market.[1]

United States*, 370 U.S. 294, 324 (1962) ("Determination of the relevant market is . . . necessary. . . because the threatened monopoly must be one which will substantially lessen competition 'within the area of effective competition.' . . . The 'area of effective competition' must be determined by reference to a product market (the 'line of commerce') and a geographic market. . . Combination or Conspiracy to Monopolize Does Not Require Establishment of Monopoly Power Within a Relevant Market

As you may have noticed as I outlined the elements required to establish a combination or conspiracy to monopolize claim, there is no requirement that plaintiffs establish that the defendants actually had monopoly power, nor is there any requirement for plaintiffs to establish a relevant product or geographic market. Accordingly, even if you do not find that plaintiffs have established that defendants had monopoly power within a relevant market, you may still find for plaintiffs on their combination or conspiracy to monopolize claim if you find that plaintiffs have proven each of the elements of this claim.[2]

Ragu Foods, Inc.*, 627 F.2d 919, 925 (9th Cir. 1980) ("no particular level of market power or 'dangerous probability of success' has to be alleged or proved in a conspiracy claim where the specific intent to monopolize is otherwise apparent from the character of the actions taken"); Salco Corp. v. General Motors Corp., 517 F.2d 567, 576 (10th Cir. 1975) ("Section 2 makes it unlawful to conspire to monopolize 'any part' of interstate commerce. Specific intent to monopolize is the heart of a conspiracy charge, and a plaintiff is not required to prove what is the 'relevant market."); United States v. Consolidated Laundries Corp., 291 F.2d 563, 573 (2d Cir. 1961)("In a monopolization case the market must be proved . . . because such a charge requires a showing of power to exclude competitors[,] . . . [b]ut where the charge is conspiracy to monopolize, the essential element is not the power [in some relevant market], but the specific intent, to monopolize. Section 2 makes it unlawful to conspire to monopolize 'any part' of interstate commerce, without specifying how large a part must be affected.").

Was it error for the court of appeals to conclude, based on the particular facts and circumstances of this case, that, without proof of the alleged relevant market, it was not possible to evaluate Petitioners' claim that Major League Soccer and the United States Soccer Federation had engaged in a "conspiracy to monopolize" under Section 2 of the Sherman Act?

Was it error for the court of appeals to conclude, based on the particular facts and circumstances of this case, that Petitioners were bound by a jury verdict rejecting, after four years of litigation and a three-month trial, the relevant market definition most favorable to their case and the only relevant market definition they had ever proposed?

MLS RESPONDENTS' BRIEF IN OPPOSITION TO PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI

On a review of the voluminous record of a three-month jury trial and the four years of litigation that preceded it, the First Circuit affirmed the dismissal of Petitioners' claims under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The court did so based on the specific facts and circumstances presented by this case, without establishing any general principles of law or otherwise announcing legal rules of precedential value.

Petitioners, a class of soccer players employed by respondent Major League Soccer, L.L.C. ("MLS"), nonetheless ask this Court to review two aspects of the court of appeals' decision. First, they challenge the affirmance of the trial court's ruling that, in order to prevail on their Section 2 conspiracy to monopolize claim, Petitioners had to prove the relevant market in which the Respondents had allegedly sought to foreclose competition through an exclusive dealing arrangement. (Pet. at 9-19.) The decision of the First Circuit, however, was by its own terms sui generis, the court focusing solely on the facts and circumstances of this case and specifically declining to hold that proof of a relevant market is required in all conspiracy to monopolize cases. (35a.)[1] Although Petitioners attempt to establish the existence of a growing divergence of opinion among the circuits on this issue

[1] Citations in the form "___a" refer to the appendix to the Petition in this Court. Citations in the form "A___" refer to the Joint Appendix filed in the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit.

(Pet. at 15-19), any "circuit split" that may once have existed has been effectively rectified by this Court's ruling in Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447 (1993). Indeed, that decision has engendered a coalescing of opinion among the circuits that relevant market evidence is required for a conspiracy to monopolize claim.

Petitioners also seek review of the First Circuit's affirmance of the dismissal of their Section 1 claim that Major League Soccer, though a single limited liability company, is in reality a group of independent competitors seeking to restrict competition among themselves for player services. Petitioners argue that, because the court of appeals expressed, in dicta, some disagreement with the district court's reasoning in rejecting this claim, it should have remanded the case for a new trial. (Pet. at 19-22.) Notably, this claim was decided on cross-motions for summary judgment, the parties assuming the validity of Petitioners' relevant market definition solely for purposes of those motions. (50a.) Thus, the only issue that was not resolved on summary judgment was the alleged relevant market, and that issue has since been the subject of a three-month jury trial. Petitioners' complaint that they were denied a trial by jury on their Section 1 claim is therefore a hollow one, at best.

In any event, the First Circuit held only that, on a review of the particular facts and circumstances of this case, throughout which for tactical reasons Petitioners repeatedly urged the adoption of a single, specific, narrowly crafted relevant market definition, there was every reason to believe that "if the section 1 claim had not been dismissed on summary judgment it would have been presented at trial with the same market analysis alleged in the complaint." (19a.) On that basis, not on the basis of any holding of general application, the court concluded that the jury's rejection of Petitioners' relevant market theory would have doomed their Section 1 claim as well. That principles of collateral estoppel required this result only confirms that there is no reason for this Court to review the First Circuit's ruling.

Even if the legal issues presented by Petitioners were otherwise worthy of this Court's attention, this would not be an appropriate case in which to address them. At bottom, this is a dispute between an employer and its employees over terms and conditions of employment of professional athletes. As this Court held in Brown v. Pro Football, Inc., 518 U.S. 231 (1996), labor disputes are best resolved through application of the federal labor laws, not through antitrust litigation. Because principles of national antitrust policy should not be determined in the context of a labor dispute, the petition for a writ of certiorari should be denied.

COUNTER-STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. The Creation of Major League Soccer

Soccer is by far the most popular team spectator sport in the world. Although United States sports fans have historically failed to support professional soccer leagues, hope for professional soccer in this country rose in 1988, when the international soccer federation awarded the United States the right to host the 1994 World Cup tournament. A condition of that award was that a Division I (i.e., major league) professional soccer league be established in this country. (A6635.) To that end, in December 1993, three organizations interested in operating a Division I soccer league presented business plans to the National Board of Directors of the United States Soccer Federation ("USSF").[2] (A7968-69.) After unanimously confirming its long-standing position (A8361; A7012) that the United States could not support more than one Division I league (A7971; A7012-13), the Board sanctioned MLS by an overwhelming vote, believing that it had the greatest chance of success. (A7971; A7009-10; A7014; A7018.)[3] In 1995, MLS was granted a limited period of exclusivity; after only two seasons of MLS operation, any other applicant was free to seek Division I status from the USSF. (A8440-41.)

In order to cope with the economic realities of modern professional sports and to avoid the chronic problems encountered by its predecessors, MLS was organized so that the league, not the individual teams, has the power to conduct and control all business operations on a centralized basis.

[2] The USSF has been authorized by the Congressionally sanctioned United States Olympic Committee to be the national governing body for soccer in this country. 36 U.S.C. § 220501. (A7050.)

[3] The only other serious bidder, the Division II American Professional Soccer League, simply did not compare with MLS in terms of its capitalization, track record and potential for success. (A8454; A7628-724; A7500-618; A7009-10; A7014; A8652; A8655.)

Critical to MLS's ultimate success, its founders believed, was the ability to engage in league-wide marketing programs, to coordinate and control all broadcasting contracts, to offer integrated sponsorship packages and licensing deals, to spread revenues and allocate expenses equally among all the teams, to control employee salaries and other costs, and to determine the teams for which each player would play. (A1697; A1649-53.) Thus, unlike other sports leagues, which grew out of localized sports businesses and have long operated as joint ventures or unincorporated associations of individually owned and separately constituted "franchises," MLS is structured like a conventional modern business, a limited liability company that controls all aspects of league operations.[4]

B. MLS and Competitive Forces

MLS's centralized structure has helped it grow and survive. During its existence, average MLS player salaries have increased by nearly 20%. (A8655.) In contrast, the league itself continues to be a highly *un*profitable venture for its investors, who as of 2000 had lost, in the aggregate, over $250 million since the league's inception. (A7240; A8651; A7178.)

MLS confronts the ongoing challenge of gaining a foothold in the vast and highly competitive worldwide market

[4] Petitioners improperly refer to a "1990 memo" in their factual recitation (Pet. at 3-4) as purported evidence of anticompetitive intent in connection with the formation of MLS. That document, prepared by counsel to analyze one possible "single entity" league structure, was not part of the evidence before the jury at trial.

for soccer player services. Minor leagues, indoor leagues and other leagues and teams throughout the world compete with one another, and with MLS, to attract and sign the best available soccer players. Unlike other major U.S. sports leagues, each of which is the highest-paying league of its kind, MLS consistently loses the best professional soccer players to leagues in other countries where, for most top soccer players, salaries and ancillary earning opportunities are substantially greater than in the United States. (A7169.)

The extensive trial evidence established that MLS competes for player services in an international marketplace, and that MLS players have played professional soccer throughout the world. Nearly 200 MLS players played professional soccer in dozens of foreign countries either before or after they joined MLS. (A6298-302; A7172-74; A8445; A6459.) In each of MLS's first five seasons, nearly 40% of the 200-250 players on MLS team rosters had foreign citizenship. (A7175-76; A6304.) The evidence also demonstrated that the market in which MLS competes for player services extends beyond Division I. MLS players have numerous opportunities in lower division leagues worldwide. (A6298-302; A7172-74; A8445.) Indeed, MLS is regularly outbid for its players by lower division clubs throughout the world. (A7176-77.)

C. Proceedings in the District Court

This litigation was commenced in 1997, shortly after the league's inaugural season. Petitioners[5] alleged that the MLS Respondents had unlawfully conspired to restrain trade in the market for player services in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act by structuring the league so that all players are hired centrally by MLS rather than by the individual MLS teams. (A3318-19.)[6] They also contended that the MLS Respondents and the USSF violated Section 2 of the Sherman Act by temporarily establishing MLS as the only Division I league in the United States. (A3321-22.) With respect to both of these counts, Petitioners defined the relevant market for player services in precisely the same way: the market "for the services of major league ('Division I') professional soccer players in the United States." (A3318; A3321.)

The MLS Respondents moved for partial summary judgment, arguing that the league's status as a limited liability company rendered it incapable, as a single actor, of violating Section 1 of the Sherman Act. (A1624-25.) Petitioners cross-moved for partial summary judgment on this issue. (A1601-02.) The district court rejected Petitioners' attempt to

[5] The plaintiff class consists of "all players who either have been, or are now, or will be under contract to play ('Division I') professional outdoor soccer for [MLS] . . . ." (A3055.)

[6] The First Circuit also affirmed the dismissal of Petitioners' claim that the transactions that formed MLS violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act. (35a-39a.) Petitioners do not challenge that ruling in this Court.

portray MLS and its investors as a conventional, franchise-based sports league and dismissed their Section 1 claim, declaring that "the plaintiffs' deconstruction efforts are unavailing. MLS is what it is. As a single entity, it cannot conspire or combine with its investors in violation of § 1, and its investors do not combine or conspire with each other in pursuing the economic interests of the entity." (61a.)

Shortly after this ruling, a jury trial commenced with respect to Petitioners' Section 2 claim.[7] In the 3½ years of pretrial discovery, the parties had produced over 400,000 pages of documents and conducted 58 depositions. During the trial, the parties called 19 live witnesses, introduced 263 exhibits into evidence, and developed a trial transcript of nearly 7,000 pages. Eight of the eleven weeks of testimony were occupied by Petitioners' submission of evidence, at the conclusion of which the district court presented a 15-question special verdict form to the 11 jurors. (A7490.) After deliberating for a full day, the jury answered the first two

[7] Just before trial, Petitioners revealed for the first time an intent to introduce evidence relating to the formation and operation of MLS as a single company in connection with their Section 2 claim. (A3924-25.) The MLS Respondents moved in limine to preclude the introduction of such evidence as legally irrelevant to that claim and as a circumvention of the dismissal of their Section 1 claim. (A3966-68.) After full briefing and argument, the district court ruled that Section 2 liability could not be based on MLS's formation and operation as a single company. (A3939-44; A3948-49; A4807; A4811-13.) Petitioners' criticism of this ruling (Pet. at 7) ignores the court's simultaneous determination that evidence concerning MLS's unitary status would be permitted as relevant to the jury's overall understanding of the case. (A4806-07.)

questions in the negative, refusing to agree with Petitioners that MLS competes for players in a market both restricted to the United States and limited to Division I player services. (A5706.) With no need for further deliberations, judgment was entered dismissing the Section 2 claim. (40a-43a.)[8]

D. The First Circuit Opinion

In a unanimous opinion (3a-39a), the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit affirmed the judgment of the district court. In affirming the dismissal of the Petitioners' Section 2 claim, the court rejected all contentions that the jury verdict was tainted by erroneous trial rulings. The court further concluded that the jury's refusal to accept Petitioners' contention that the relevant market was limited to the services of Division I soccer players in the United States required dismissal of all aspects of their Section 2 claim.

In so doing, the court held that, in the particular circumstances presented by this case, proof of the relevant market alleged by Petitioners was required before liability could be imposed for a conspiracy to monopolize. Observing that "[c]onspiracy to monopolize claims are not often the subject of much attention, since almost any such claim could be proved more easily under section 1's ban on conspiracies in restraint of trade," the court reviewed the pertinent authorities

[8] At the close of evidence, the district court granted a motion dismissing the Section 2 claims as against each of the MLS investors named as defendants. (A7356.) Petitioners do not challenge this ruling on appeal.

and found "more persuasive" those stating that a relevant market is necessary for such a claim. (32a.) Although noting that "there may in principle be some cases in which one could argue that a conspiracy claim should be provable without a showing that the alleged market is a real economic market," the court held that "[t]his case is not among them." (32a-33a.)

The court reasoned that because the particular agreement challenged in this case, "a garden variety exclusive dealing arrangement limited to three years," was "not inherently unlawful," its legality would have to be:

> judged primarily by considering, in addition to competitive or efficiency justifications, any actual or threatened adverse effects on competition. Predicted effects turn, obviously, on the establishment of a market in which the exclusive dealing arrangement may affect prices or competitors. Absent threatened effects, there is normally no basis for condemning an exclusive dealing arrangement.

The First Circuit also affirmed the district court's judgment dismissing Petitioners' claim that MLS, even though structured as a single limited liability company, was in reality a conspiracy of competing team owners operating in violation of Section 1. The court so ruled based on its conclusion that liability could not be imposed on the MLS Respondents in the face of the jury's rejection of the Petitioners' relevant market theory. The court did not accept Petitioners' contention that if they had been permitted to go to trial on this claim they might have persuaded the jury to find a different relevant market. As Petitioners had structured their case, the First Circuit ruled, there was "no reason to think that any other market would have been alleged and made the subject of proof if the section 1 claim had gone to trial along with the section 2 claims." (18a.) The court therefore concluded that "any error in dismissing the claim based on a single entity theory was harmless .... The outcome, as the plaintiffs shaped their own case, would have been the same." (19a-20a.)

There being no need for the court to address the applicability of Section 1 to the conduct of the MLS Respondents, the First Circuit acknowledged that its discussion of the "single entity" issue was obiter dicta: "we conclude that the single entity problem need not be answered definitively in this case." (16a.)[9] [9] Thus, this Court should ignore Petitioners' repeated protestations that the First Circuit "overturned" or "rejected" the district court's analysis of the single entity issue (Pet. at 8, 19).

REASONS FOR DENYING THE PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI

1. There Is No Need for This Court to Consider Petitioners' Argument That a Claim for Conspiracy to Monopolize Under Section 2 of the Sherman Act Can Be Sustained Without Proof of Any Relevant Market.

a. Petitioners Vastly Overstate the Scope and Significance of the First Circuit's Ruling.

Petitioners attempt to portray the decision below as one that declared, for all cases and all purposes, that "proof of a relevant market is an essential element of a conspiracy to monopolize claim" (Pet. at 12). By so doing, they inappropriately seek to inflate the significance of the First Circuit's opinion and its status in antitrust jurisprudence.

Contrary to Petitioners' depiction, the First Circuit did nothing more than conclude that, in this particular case, Petitioners were required to prove the relevant market they had alleged. The court accepted the proposition that in some conspiracy to monopolize cases, proof of a relevant market may not be necessary, referring as examples to situations in which "conspirators were aiming at a demonstrably illegal result, say, a world wide monopoly of gold production or a naked horizontal allocation of markets." (34a.) In such cases, the court observed, "the conspiracy should be punished because the demonstrated intent to break the law shows that the conspirators are dangerous even if this particular venture was impractical." (Id.)

Here, however, the First Circuit recognized that the illegality of the challenged arrangement "is far from clear. To ignore the question whether [Division I soccer in the United States] is a relevant market in the economic sense is to assume that the end aimed at is illegal." (Id.) The court continued:

> [T]here may be contexts in which the existence vel non of a relevant market is beside the point in a conspiracy to monopolize case, but this case is not one of them. The exclusivity agreement sought by MLS might be unlawful if it threatened adverse competitive effects but not otherwise; and this in turn required proof that someone who was the only purchaser of Division I soccer player services in the United States would control prices in an economic market.

(35a.)[10]

Thus, it is apparent from the opinion below that the court viewed this case as sui generis, and that it had no intention of announcing a generally applicable principle of antitrust law. Simply put, the alleged errors in the First Circuit's decision do not warrant review by this Court.

[10] Indeed, the substance of the First Circuit's opinion is not far removed from the position urged by Petitioners, who concede that "evidence of a relevant market might . . . be useful to a jury in assessing a claim of specific intent to monopolize." (Pet. at 14.)

b. Any "Circuit Split" That May Once Have Existed Was Insignificant and Has, in Any Event, Been Resolved by This Court's Decision in Spectrum Sports.

Petitioners argue vigorously that circuits have reached differing conclusions regarding the need to establish a relevant market in a conspiracy to monopolize claim, contending that there is a "pervasive" and "deepening" rift (Pet. at 9, 15) that this Court should resolve. Even if Petitioners were correct that there was a division among the courts of appeals on this issue, this Court's ruling in Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447 (1993), has resolved it.

In Spectrum Sports, this Court decided that an attempt to monopolize claim requires proof of a dangerous probability of monopolization of a relevant market. The Ninth Circuit, following its earlier ruling in Lessig v. Tidewater Oil Co., 327 F.2d 459 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 993 (1964), had held that because Section 2 prohibits attempts to monopolize "any part" of commerce, it did not matter what part of commerce was implicated. See Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 457. Rejecting that approach, this Court explained that the reference to "any part" in Section 2 did not mean that liability could be imposed without reference to any relevant market, but that it was "immaterial how large an amount of interstate trade is affected, or how important that part of commerce is in relation to the entire amount of that type of commerce in the Nation." Id. at 457 & n.9. Thus, proof of a relevant market was required.

Although Spectrum Sports did not specifically involve a claim for conspiracy to monopolize, the reasoning of the decision is equally applicable to that offense. Section 2 of the Sherman Act makes it unlawful for any person to "monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States . . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 2 (emphasis supplied). Congress applied the requirement that some "part" of interstate commerce be adversely affected to all three components of Section 2 without differentiation. Spectrum Sports thus can only be read to require that, like claims of monopolization and attempted monopolization, conspiracy to monopolize claims must be assessed in the context of a relevant market. See 2 Julian O. von Kalinowski et al., Antitrust Laws and Trade Regulation § 26.02[6], at 26-52 to 26-53 (2d ed. 2002).

Not surprisingly, circuits addressing the issue since Spectrum Sports have almost uniformly reached that conclusion. In Electronics Communications Corp. v. Toshiba America Consumer Products, Inc., 129 F.3d 240, 246 (2d Cir. 1997), for example, the Second Circuit expressly relied on Spectrum Sports in concluding that a "defendant's power in the relevant market must be established" in a conspiracy to monopolize case. By so doing, the court overruled prior Second Circuit decisions such as United States v. Consolidated Laundries Corp., 291 F.2d 563 (2d Cir. 1961), and Volvo North America Corp. v. Men's International Professional Tennis Council, 857 F.2d 55, 74 (2d Cir. 1988), two cases on which Petitioners rely (Pet. at 16-17 n.11). See also Doctor's Hosp. of Jefferson, Inc. v. S.E. Med. Alliance, Inc., 123 F.3d 301, 311 (5th Cir. 1997) ("To establish Section 2 violations premised on attempt and conspiracy to monopolize, a plaintiff must define the relevant market.").[11]

Most of the cases cited by Petitioners (Pet. at 16 n.9) for the proposition that proof of a relevant market is unnecessary were decided before this Court rejected that view in Spectrum Sports. In any event, even if these decisions are still good law, they do not help establish the existence of a circuit split. For example, the Fourth Circuit in Advanced Health-Care Services, Inc. v. Radford Community Hospital, 910 F.2d 139 (4th Cir. 1990), did not address one way or the other whether proof of a relevant market was required, but did list "a specific intent to achieve an unlawful monopoly" as a necessary element of a conspiracy to monopolize claim. Id. at 150 (emphasis supplied). In measuring the complaint against these elements, the court recited that plaintiff had alleged "a specific intent to monopolize relevant markets (the [durable medical equipment] markets for the geographic areas surrounding the hospitals) . . . ." Id. (emphasis supplied). The clear implication of this parallelism is that a court can only determine whether the [11] Even before Spectrum Sports, the Eleventh Circuit had ruled that "relevant market is a necessary element of a conspiracy to monopolize." Bill Beasley Farms, Inc. v. Hubbard Farms, 695 F.2d 1341, 1343 (11th Cir. 1983).

object of a conspiracy is an "unlawful monopoly" in the context of a relevant market.[12]

Similarly, the Tenth Circuit in Monument Builders of Greater Kansas City, Inc. v. America Cemetery Ass'n of Kansas, 891 F.2d 1473, 1484 (10th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 930 (1990), never stated that a charge of conspiracy to monopolize could be analyzed without regard to a relevant market. To the contrary, the court reversed the dismissal of a conspiracy to monopolize claim in part because the plaintiff had alleged an intent to monopolize "the Kansas City market for grave markers." Id. Moreover, the Tenth Circuit has since expressly declared, in Full Draw Productions v. Easton Sports, Inc., 182 F.3d 745, 756 (10th Cir. 1999), that one element of a conspiracy to monopolize claim is the "specific intent on the part of defendants to monopolize the relevant market."

The Ninth Circuit's decision in Hunt-Wesson Foods, Inc. v. Ragu Foods, Inc., 627 F.2d 919, 926 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 921 (1981), likewise provides no support for Petitioners' contention. The court never stated that liability could be established without proof of a relevant market, and [12] The only court of appeals decision cited by Petitioners that post-dates Spectrum Sports, Intergraph Corp. v. Intel Corp., 195 F.3d 1346 (Fed. Cir. 1999) (Pet. at 16 n.9), is to the same effect. There, the Federal Circuit noted that a conspiracy to monopolize claim requires proof of a "specific intent to achieve an unlawful monopoly," and referred specifically to the record evidence regarding the defendants' "market" and to the existence of "many competitors, with no significant entry barriers" in assessing whether there had been an adverse effect on competition. Id. at 1363-64.

in fact recognized that a plaintiff claiming a conspiracy must show that the defendants acted with a specific intent to monopolize, thereby necessitating proof of a relevant market.[13]

In short, far from exhibiting a "deepening split," the circuits have never been as divided as Petitioners suggest and, in any event, particularly in the wake of this Court's ruling in Spectrum Sports, are in the process of coalescing without this Court's further intervention. Petitioners cannot reverse that trend by presenting a substantively and temporally distorted portrait of selected decisions of the courts of appeals. The petition should be denied on this basis alone.

c. Proof of a Relevant Market Is a Necessary Element of a Conspiracy to Monopolize Claim.

Even assuming that the First Circuit had, in this case, announced that proof of a relevant market is required in all conspiracy to monopolize cases – which, as discussed above, it did not – there is no need for this Court to upset the emerging trend among the circuits to reach a conclusion that

[13] In any event, the continuing validity of the Ninth Circuit's ruling in Hunt-Wesson is in considerable doubt, given that it was predicated chiefly on three now-discredited precedents: (1) the Second Circuit's 1961 decision in Consolidated Laundries, the reasoning of which was rejected by that court itself in Electronics Communications Corp. (see supra pp. 15-16), (2) the Ninth Circuit's 1964 decision in Lessig, which this Court overruled in Spectrum Sports (see supra pp. 14-15), and (3) the Tenth Circuit's ruling in Salco Corp. v. General Motors Corp., 517 F.2d 567, 576 (10th Cir. 1975), a case implicitly overruled in Full Draw, 182 F.3d at 756.

is thoroughly consistent with fundamental principles of antitrust law and policy.

Petitioners declare, without any citation to authority, that "the only reason for establishing a relevant market in a monopolization case is to prove market power" (Pet. at 11). From this unsupported premise they argue that because market power is not a required element of a conspiracy to monopolize claim, proof of a relevant market is unnecessary. This syllogism is fatally flawed.

While a conspiracy to monopolize claim does not require proof of monopoly power (as does a claim of monopolization), or of a dangerous probability of successfully acquiring such power (as does a claim of attempted monopolization), as noted above such a claim does require proof that a defendant acted with a specific intent to monopolize. Allegations that a defendant acted with specific intent cannot be evaluated or proven without first establishing a market context against which to consider them. Simple logic and basic antitrust principles confirm the validity of this proposition. Monopoly power is the power to control prices or exclude competition in the relevant market. United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 391-92 (1956). Thus, a defendant cannot be said to have acted with the specific intent to monopolize where that defendant's intent is not directed toward foreclosing competition in the relevant market.

Moreover, punishing a defendant for possessing a particular intent, when that intent is not directed toward the relevant market, would do nothing to further the goals of the antitrust laws. This Court has repeatedly stated that the antitrust laws are designed to protect competition, not individual competitors. See Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 768 n.14 (1984) (quoting Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488 (1977)); Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320 (1962). Unless a defendant specifically intends to monopolize the relevant market, there is no danger that such specific intent could result in monopoly power, and no danger that competition will be harmed. Where there is no possible harm to competition, antitrust concerns need not and should not be raised.[14] Defining the relevant market is therefore necessary to assess whether a defendant's alleged specific intent could injure competition if it were acted upon.[15]

Additionally, the alleged conspiracy between MLS and the USSF, two entities that are not potential competitors and

[14] As the district court stated in response to Petitioners' suggestion that any intent, regardless of whether the market contemplated is actually the relevant market, was sufficient to support Section 2 liability under a conspiracy to monopolize claim: "That sounds to me like liability from pipe dreams." (A7383.)

[15] The First Circuit agreed, observing that the "exclusivity agreement sought by MLS might be unlawful if it threatened adverse competitive effects but not otherwise; and this in turn required proof that someone who was the only purchaser of Division I soccer player services in the United States would control prices in an economic market." (35a.)

one of which does not even participate in the relevant market, would clearly be subject to rule of reason scrutiny under Section 1, meaning that Petitioners would be obligated to prove their relevant market in order to demonstrate the potential for anticompetitive effects.[16] There is no logical basis for permitting Petitioners to circumvent this process in connection with their Section 2 claim, which is similarly designed to protect competition and should not be employed where the intent or conduct in question would be incapable of causing anticompetitive effects. As a leading antitrust authority observed:

> To require power under § 1 before condemning a particular agreement is necessarily to say that the arrangement is socially desirable, or at least not harmful, in the absence of power. That policy conclusion cannot sensibly be avoided or negated by the simple trick of calling the agreement a conspiracy to monopolize.

3A Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 809, at 390-91 (2d ed. 2002).

General principles of conspiracy law confirm this conclusion. The law does not impose liability based on a conspiracy that exists solely in the abstract; conspiracy allegations can only be evaluated in the context of the object of the conspiracy. See United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422, 444 (1978); see also Haddle v. Garrison, 525 U.S. 121, 124-25 (1998); Salinas v. United States, 522 U.S. 52, 63 (1997). Thus, a conspiracy to monopolize claim cannot succeed without proof of what it was that the alleged conspirators sought to monopolize, i.e., the relevant market.

---

[16] Conversely, where the alleged conduct, if proved, would amount to a per se restraint of trade under Section 1, a Section 2 conspiracy to monopolize claim would be unnecessary.

Petitioners' attempt to wring a contrary holding out of this Court's prior rulings, such as American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781 (1946) (Pet. at 10-11), is unavailing. Although this Court ruled in American Tobacco and its progeny that proof of market power is not required for a conspiracy to monopolize claim, it did not eliminate the need for proof of the market sought to be monopolized. Rather, this Court specifically referred to the market that was the object of the alleged conspiracy, noting that it was "to exclude actual and potential competitors from the cigarette field." Id. at 788 (emphasis supplied).

While none of the cases cited in Point I-A of the Petition (at 10-12) support the contention that this Court has in some oblique way already dispensed with the need to prove a relevant market in a conspiracy to monopolize case,[17] the [17] Petitioners' citation to Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 768-69 (1984) (Pet. at 11) is misleading. Nothing in Copperweld, which discussed the applicability of Section 1 of the Sherman Act to the concerted action of a corporation and its wholly owned subsidiary, suggests that this Court viewed a conspiracy to monopolize under Section 2 as a more serious offense than actual monopolization.

contrary is suggested in the passage Petitioners themselves quote from Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 626-27 (1953) (Pet. at 13), which held that a specific intent to destroy competition under Section 2 cannot be found when an action is "predominantly motivated by legitimate business aims." Because the legitimacy of business aims cannot be assessed outside of the context of a relevant market, the need to prove the existence of such a market is subsumed within the requirement that "specific intent" be shown.

In sum, proof that parties have entered into an agreement to affect competition in an amorphous, undefined way is simply insufficient to support a violation of Section 2. A plaintiff must establish the relevant market, the part of commerce the alleged wrongdoers intended to affect. If Petitioners had their way, they would be entitled to treble damages and injunctive relief under Section 2 regardless of whether MLS and the USSF had agreed to take steps to dominate the worldwide market for automobile manufacturing or to control the market for 5'10" tall professional soccer players living within three blocks of RFK Stadium. This ludicrous result cannot have been intended by Congress in adopting the Sherman Act, or by this Court in interpreting that law.

There being no reason for this Court to review the First Circuit's affirmance of the dismissal of Petitioners' claim of conspiracy to monopolize, the petition should be denied.

2. Petitioners Cannot Complain That They Were Denied a Jury Trial on Their Claim That MLS's Structure Violates Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

a. Despite Petitioners' Urging, No "Messages" Need Be Sent to the Courts of Appeals.

Petitioners ask this Court to review the First Circuit's affirmance of the judgment dismissing their Section 1 claim, in which they contended that MLS, although undisputedly a single limited liability company, was in reality a group of individual competitors capable of engaging in a conspiracy among themselves. Petitioners argue that because the court of appeals – in what can only be characterized as pure dicta (see supra p.11) – expressed some disagreement with the district court's reasoning on this claim before affirming on other grounds, it should have remanded the case to the district court, perhaps for yet another trial.

Petitioners assert that the court below improperly "speculat[ed] about what type of relevant market [Petitioners] would have presented had a §1 trial been conducted." (Pet. at 20.) They criticize the court for having observed that it had "been given no reason to think that any other market would have been alleged and made the subject of proof if the section 1 claim had gone to trial along with the section 2 claims." (18a.) Because Petitioners failed to persuade the jury that their proposed relevant market definition was correct, the First Circuit concluded that if the Section 1 claim had been tried, it would have failed as well.

The court based this conclusion on the fact that, throughout this case, Petitioners consistently urged one, and only one, relevant market definition. (18a-20a.) Petitioners' pleadings, discovery demands, pre-trial proceedings, expert opinions and trial evidence all revolved around their contention that the relevant market was confined to Division I soccer players in the United States. (A3298-327; A5195-216; A6366.) This was obviously an adverten[illegible] strategic decision. In Petitioners' view, because MLS was the only competitor in that alleged market, success on their relevant market theory would ineluctably lead to a holding that MLS was a monopolist. As the district court observed, "the plaintiffs' proposed market definition was the fundament for the rest of the theory of liability." (A5724.)

As with its analysis of Petitioners' Section 2 claim, the court of appeals' ruling on this issue was sui generis, highly fact-specific and limited to the circumstances of this case. The court made no broad legal pronouncements that are appropriate for this Court's review. Even if the First Circuit had somehow established an erroneous precedent, there is no principle of Supreme Court jurisprudence that counsels in favor of issuing writs of certiorari and deciding cases solely for the purpose of "sending messages" to the courts of appeals, as Petitioners urge (Pet. at 19). Accordingly, the petition should be denied without further consideration.

b. Principles of Collateral Estoppel Bar Petitioners from Relitigating the Relevant Market Issue in Connection with Their Section 1 Claim.

Basic principles of collateral estoppel also militate against a grant of the petition. Petitioners should not be allowed to circumvent, in prosecuting their Section 1 claim, the jury's categorical rejection of their relevant market theory.

If MLS were subject to Section 1 scrutiny, MLS's centralized decision-making with respect to players – the conduct challenged by Petitioners – would be judged under a full rule of reason standard.[18] Under that standard, a plaintiff must establish the potential for anticompetitive effects. FTC v. Ind. Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 460-61 (1986). This typically requires proof that the defendant possesses market power in the relevant market. See Doctor's Hosp. of Jefferson, Inc. v. S.E. Med. Alliance, Inc., 123 F.3d 301, 311 n.20 (5th Cir. 1997). Here, of course, the jury found that the market alleged by Petitioners does not exist.[19] Because the relevant [18] Petitioners no longer contend that the activities of the MLS Respondents should be declared per se illegal.

[19] Petitioners are wrong in suggesting (Pet. at 20-21) that a "quick look" analysis would apply, and that they would not have needed to prove market power – or the relevant market – in this case. A "quick look" is justified only in those rare cases where proof of market power would be superfluous because "the great likelihood of anticompetitive effects can be easily ascertained." Cal. Dental Ass'n v. FTC, 526 U.S. 756, 770 (1999); see Ind. Fed'n, 476 U.S. at 460-61. MLS is a new and small entrant in the vast international market for soccer player services and in the crowded market inquiry is the same for both Section 1 and Section 2, see United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 573 (1966); Doctor's Hosp., 123 F.3d at 310-12; Metro Indus., Inc. v. Sammi Corp., 82 F.3d 839, 842, 848-49 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 519 U.S. 868 (1996), – indeed, the complaint defined the market identically for both claims (A3318-23) – Petitioners' failure to establish their alleged relevant market at trial on the Section 2 claim should preclude them, as a matter of law, from relitigating the issue.[20]

In sum, proof of relevant market undisputedly being an essential element of Petitioners' Section 1 claim, the dismissal of that claim should have been affirmed in any event based on Petitioners' failure to prove the relevant market on their Section 2 claim.[21] professional sports industry. Because it is unable to negotiate for players from a position of strength, Petitioners could not prove that MLS possesses sufficient market power to cause anticompetitive effects. Where, as here, the conduct at issue has plausible competitive justifications, a court cannot – without a close look – shift the burden to the defendant to come forward with "hard evidence" of procompetitive effects. Cal. Dental, 526 U.S. at 771, 776.

[20] See, e.g. McNeil v. NFL, 790 F. Supp. 871, 892-93 (D. Minn. 1992); Selectron, Inc. v. AT&T Co., 587 F. Supp. 856, 859-60, 862 (D. Or. 1984); Oberweis Dairy, Inc. v. Associated Milk Producers, Inc., 553 F. Supp. 962, 970 (N.D. Ill. 1982).

[21] Even if there were any merit to Petitioners' suggestion (Pet. at 21) that, had summary judgment not been granted, they might have been permitted to amend their complaint before trial on their Section 1 claim, or that at trial their complaint would have been deemed amended to conform to whatever relevant market the evidence might have supported, that

3. Even if the Court Wished to Address the Antitrust Issues Set Forth in the Petition, Federal Labor Policy Would Counsel Against a Grant of Certiorari Here.

There is an additional, prudential reason for this Court to deny the petition. This is not the proper context in which to resolve any issues of nationwide antitrust law and policy. In fact, this is not an antitrust suit at all. It was brought by a group of employees – professional athletes – who were dissatisfied with the terms and conditions of their employment. Rather than following the procedures required by the federal labor laws for the resolution of such issues, Petitioners chose to file an antitrust suit, claiming that certain of their employment terms violate the federal antitrust laws.

In Brown v. Pro Football, Inc., 518 U.S. 231, 236, 242 (1996), however, this Court made clear that "judicial use of antitrust law to resolve labor disputes" is inappropriate, and confirmed that "[t]he [federal] labor laws give the [NLRB], not antitrust courts, primary responsibility for policing the argument thoroughly misses the point. What the First Circuit found dispositive was that, throughout this entire case, including not only the three-month trial on Petitioners' Section 2 claim, but also the three years preceding summary judgment on their Section 1 claim, Petitioners had never urged any relevant market definition other than that eventually rejected by the jury. Further, Petitioners cannot escape the jury verdict's preclusive effect on their Section 1 claim as pled (17a-18a) by attempting to conjecture about other, as yet undelineated market definitions they might pursue at a subsequent trial; such a reading of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(b) would effectively eviscerate the doctrine of collateral estoppel.

collective-bargaining process." This precept is consistent with a long line of federal cases holding that the Sherman Act was never intended to apply to disputes over terms and conditions of employment. The principal concern of the Sherman Act has always been to ensure competition in the marketing of goods and services, not to regulate the collective bargaining process or the terms of employment for which workers and employers should collectively bargain. See Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U.S. 469, 495 (1940); Kennedy v. Long Island R.R. Co., 319 F.2d 366, 372-73 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 830 (1963).

Whether the holding of Brown and the labor exemption applies to this case is not an issue before this Court. Nevertheless, the essential teaching of Brown is that federal labor policy requires that labor disputes be resolved under the procedures and protections established by the labor laws, not in an antitrust courtroom. Accordingly, the MLS Respondents respectfully submit that this labor dispute does not provide the appropriate setting for resolution of issues of antitrust law.

Respondent United States Soccer Federation, Inc. ("USSF") submits this brief in opposition to the petition for certiorari of the Petitioners Iain Fraser, Steve Trittshuh, Sean Bowers, Mark Semioli, Rhett Harty, David Scott Vaudreuil, Mark Dodd and Mark Dougherty (the "Petitioners"). The other Respondents, Major League Soccer, L.L.C. ("MLS") and its investor-operators (collectively, the "MLS Respondents") also are submitting a brief in opposition to the petition.

COUNTER STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Background of the Litigation

USSF is designated by the United States Olympic Committee (the "USOC") as the national governing body of soccer in the United States, as set forth in the Ted Stevens Olympic and Amateur Sports Act (36 U.S.C. Secs. 220501, et seq.) (the "Sports Act") (A 6560).[1]

Congress passed the original of the Sports Act in 1978, creating a vertical structure for the management of sports in the United States. The USOC is at the head of this vertical structure, and it acts as the coordinating body for sports in which American athletes compete at the international level.

Each sport included in the Olympic or Pan-American games has a "national governing body," which functions at the level below the USOC. See 36 U.S.C. § 220521. To be recognized as a national governing body, a sports organization must demonstrate autonomy in its sport, and it must independently decide and control all matters central to governance of that sport. Once established, a national governing body has broad authority. See 36 U.S.C. §§ 220523-220524. A national governing body establishes national goals for its sport, and it acts as the coordinating body for the sport in the United States. In addition, the national governing body is responsible for developing interest and participation in the sport throughout the United States. The national governing body also selects and recommends to USOC the members of the Olympic Team for the sport. USSF is the national governing body for soccer in the United States. It is a non profit corporation (A 6560-6562).

The structure created by the Sports Act is applicable to this action, which involves professional athletes. The Sports Act (36 U.S.C. § 220501) defines "amateur athlete" as an athlete "who meets the eligibility standards established by the national governing body or paraolympic sports organization for the sport in which the athlete competes." USSF has eligibility standards which permit professionals to compete.[2] The USSF selects and recommends players for the United States Olympic Soccer Team, and at the last Olympics in 2000, all but one of those players was a professional (A 6560). The USSF also selects the players for both the men and women's National Soccer Teams, who represent the United States in other international competitions. Professionals play on the national teams, and they are subject to USSF's governance (A 6559-6560).

This case arises out of the effort to establish a Division 1 (top flight) professional league in the United States. Soccer is the most popular professional team sport in the world, in virtually every country other than the United States (A 6559). There have been many attempts to form top-flight professional soccer leagues in the United States. Prior to the 1990's, only the North American Soccer League had received the Division 1 sanction from USSF, the highest designation possible. That league eventually failed and terminated operations in or about 1984 (A 6562).

The Federation Internationale de Football Association ("FIFA") is the international federation that governs all professional and amateur soccer worldwide. USSF is a member of FIFA(A 6560-6561; 6572).

FIFA awarded the United States the right to host the 1994 World Cup soccer tournament, which is the largest sporting event in the world. FIFA required, as a condition of this award, the establishment of a Division 1 professional league in the United States as soon as possible (A 6572).

USSF, as the national governing body, had the responsibility of sanctioning a Division 1 league which would fulfill the FIFA mandate (A 6572-6573). USSF made the decision that, initially, only one entity would be sanctioned as a Division 1 league. No other country, including those where soccer is the most popular sport, has more than one Division 1 league. In making this decision, USSF considered the fact that professional soccer had never been successfully established in this country. USSF believed that all available resources — USSF support, players, fans, and sponsors — should be devoted to supporting a single league, in the first instance. USSF decided it was necessary to "incubate" one, and only one, Division 1 league (A 6582; see also, PX 190, at A 7968, et seq.).

USSF publicized the fact that it was planning to sanction a Division 1 league. In December 1993, after evaluating submissions made by three competing bidders, including MLS, USSF preliminarily endorsed MLS as the Division 1 league for soccer in the United States (Ex. 190, A 7968, et seq.).

MLS and two other contenders submitted proposals to USSF. Petitioners have claimed that USSF should have approved the American Professional Soccer League ("APSL). The proof at the trial was that APSL was not, in fact, qualified (A 6573; 6577; DX 1304). APSL was a minor league and its plan, as presented to USSF, was a minor league plan (A 6581; DX 1304).

USSF considered the idea of designating two leagues, and voted against it. The USSF board members believed that all resources should be utilized for one league, to give it a chance of success (A 6582; See also PX 190, A-7968, et seq.). The "one league" rule had been in effect since at least 1988 (A 6576; See also DX 1049, p.15, at A-8361). It had not been put in place for MLS' benefit (A 6576). Indeed, APSL's own business plans assumed there would be only one division one league. See PX 3 at page 95 (A-7599).

USSF's good faith is shown by the agreement it reached with APSL, in January of 1995, as evidenced by the document introduced as DX 1075 (A-8438). USSF, APSL and MLS all agreed that MLS' exclusivity would end after two years. USSF acted reasonably when it determined that this short period of incubation was necessary to give the new league a chance to survive.

The Action

Petitioners are professional soccer players who play, or have played, in MLS. They commenced this anti-trust action against MLS, against the investor-operators of MLS, and also against USSF. The complaint contained several causes of action, only two of which were asserted against USSF. One of those causes of action was discontinued by stipulation. Count III of the complaint, the only remaining cause of action against USSF as of the date of trial, alleged, inter alia, that MLS, its investor-operators, and USSF conspired to monopolize the market for Division 1 (top flight) professional soccer player services in the United States.

Respondents denied the material allegations of the complaint. At the trial Respondents contended, among other things, that the United States did not constitute the relevant geographic market. Respondents contended that the market for professional soccer players is international, and that the United States does not by itself constitute a discrete market. Respondents also contended that the relevant services market was not limited to Division I player services, because such services were interchangeable with services of players in Division II and Division III.

The above described monopolization count was tried to a jury. The trial lasted nearly three months. The trial court submitted a special verdict sheet to the jury, the first questions of which dealt with the issue of whether Petitioners had proved that the relevant market was limited to Division 1 soccer player services and to the United States. The jury found that Petitioners failed to do so. Accordingly, the trial court entered judgment dismissing this count against all the Appellees. As noted, it was the only remaining count against USSF.

The First Circuit affirmed the judgment of the trial court. Fraser v. Major League Soccer, L.L.C., 284 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2002). Petitioners ask this Court to grant their petition for a writ of certiorari. The petition should be denied.

REASONS FOR DENYING THE WRIT

The First Circuit did not hold that proof of a relevant market always is an essential element of a § 2 conspiracy claim. It stated that such proof might not be required if the agreement underlying the alleged conspiracy is illegal per se. The First Circuit then held that if the agreement between the alleged conspirators is not inherently illegal, then proof of a relevant market is required to prevail in a § 2 conspiracy case. 284 F.3d at 67-69. The First Circuit cited with approval (284 F.3d at 68) IIIA Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 809 (1996):

> Where the agreements involved would also be held to offend § 1 without the necessity of proving power, the failure to require it for § 2 conspiracy offense is understandable. However, in those instances where [market] power is a prerequisite to holding an agreement to be an unreasonable restraint of trade — a joint venture, for example — it would make no sense to hold the same agreement offensive to § 2 without proof of power.

(Emphasis in opinion of the First Circuit).

Petitioners argue that there is a growing split among the circuits on this issue. That is not correct. As the First Circuit noted (284 F.3d at 67), the courts which have held that proof of a relevant market is not required to prove a § 2 conspiracy have done so "often without analysis." Those courts have not considered the issue of whether proof of a relevant market is an essential element of a § 2 conspiracy claim when the alleged agreement is not itself inherently illegal. Thus, it cannot be said that there is a split among the circuits.

USSF also adopts the argument on the relevant market issue set forth in the brief of the MLS Respondents.

CONCLUSION

For all the foregoing reasons, USSF respectfully requests that the Court deny the petition for a writ of certiorari.

REPLY IN SUPPORT OF PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI

Contrary to MLS's assertion, the First Circuit's opinion deepens the well-established circuit split over whether a showing of a relevant market is an essential element of a §2 conspiracy to monopolize claim. The Court should grant the petition to resolve the split and effectuate Congress's intent to punish concerted anti-competitive behavior when it created a separate, conspiracy to monopolize offense.

I. THE COURT SHOULD GRANT CERTIORARI TO RESOLVE WHETHER PROOF OF A RELEVANT MARKET IS AN ESSENTIAL ELEMENT OF A §2 CONSPIRACY TO MONOPOLIZE CLAIM.

A. Spectrum Sports Does Not Resolve the Widely Recognized Circuit Split.

The circuits are deeply divided as to whether proof of a relevant market is an essential element of a §2 conspiracy to monopolize claim. The split has been noted by antitrust scholars Areeda, Hovenkamp, Van Kalinowski, and Kintner.[1] Indeed, the court of appeals recognized the split and noted that it was taking the minority position.[2] The ABA pattern jury instructions adopt the approach rejected by the court of appeals and do not require a showing of relevant market.[3]

The Court's decision in Spectrum Sports v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447 (1993), does not resolve the split, but, to the contrary, illuminates the proper distinction between §2's attempt and conspiracy claims. The Court in Spectrum Sports held that a plaintiff alleging a §2 attempt to monopolize claim must prove that the defendant had a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power in a relevant market. See id., at 459. Far from suggesting a similar outcome for a §2 conspiracy claim, the Court clearly distinguished between [2] "[A] majority of courts that have touched the issue have said . . . that proof of a relevant market, and hence, market power, is not required in a conspiracy to monopolize claim." Fraser v. Major League Soccer, L.L.C., 284 F.3d 47, 67 (CA1 2002).

[3] ABA SAMPLE JURY INSTRUCTIONS IN CIVIL ANTITRUST CASES, C-100-C-102 n.3 (1999 ed.).

concerted and unilateral behavior in requiring a showing of dangerous probability of success only for an attempt claim, which is directed at unilateral action. As the Court noted, concerted action to restrain competition "inherently is fraught with anticompetitive risk," see id., at 458 (citing Copperweld Corp. v. Indep. Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 768-69 (1984)), while unilateral activity is not.

Claims predicated on concerted anti-competitive behavior require a lesser showing of relevant market and market power. Indeed, under §1, some concerted activities (e.g., price-fixing) are so suspect that no showing of relevant market or market power is required.[4] Similarly, §2 conspiracy to monopolize claims must be predicated on allegations of both concerted behavior and a specific intent to monopolize (e.g., to eliminate competition and charge monopoly prices). Under the reasoning of Spectrum Sports, Copperweld, and American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 789 (1946), such concerted behavior specifically intended to achieve a monopoly is inherently more suspect under antitrust law than unilateral action. For this reason, Spectrum Sports counsels against importing the relevant market requirement, which is an element of the unilateral offense of attempt to monopolize, into claims asserting a conspiracy to monopolize.

Courts after Spectrum Sports are no closer to resolving the circuit split. Four circuits to have considered the elements of conspiracy to monopolize claims in recent years have cited Spectrum Sports.[5] Of the four, only one—Electronics Communication Corp. v. Toshiba America Consumer Products—cites Spectrum Sports as support for the proposition that proof of a relevant market is a distinct element of a conspiracy to monopolize claim.[6] 129 F.3d 240, 246 (CA2 1997). But Toshiba has not resolved the issue even within the Second Circuit. The opinion does not state that it was overruling prior cases to the contrary, nor does it ever explain why, if a showing of market power in a relevant market is required to prove attempt to monopolize, the same showing is also necessarily required to prove a conspiracy to monopolize, which is inherently more suspect. Id. Indeed, contrary to the assertion of MLS, there is no uniformity within the Second Circuit district courts since the Toshiba decision.[7]

The other three courts of appeals, which do not require proof of a relevant market as a distinct element, list the same elements used by the circuits before Spectrum Sports.[8] Since Spectrum Sports was decided, no circuit court has expressly held that because a showing of relevant market is required to [6] Toshiba is the only case MLS cites to show that circuit courts have "almost uniformly" read Spectrum Sports to require proof of a relevant market in a conspiracy to monopolize claim. MLS Br. 15.

[7] For example, the decision in Invamed, Inc. v. Barr Lab., Inc., which was rendered after Toshiba, does not require proof of a relevant market for proof of a conspiracy to monopolize offense. 22 F.Supp.2d 210 (S.D.N.Y. 1998) ("Invamed's Third Cause of Action, conspiracy to monopolize, is a claim under section 2 of the Sherman Act. To establish this claim, Invamed must allege facts sufficient to support (1) concerted action; (2) overt acts in furtherance of the conspiracy; and (3) specific intent to monopolize.").

[8] Intergraph, 195 F.3d, at 1363 ("a [conspiracy-to-monopolize] claim requires deliberate concerted action with the specific intent to achieve an unlawful monopoly, accompanied by acts in furtherance of the conspiracy"); Stewart, 200 F.3d, at 316 ("A conspiracy to monopolize can be established only by proof of (1) the existence of specific intent to monopolize; (2) the existence of a combination or conspiracy to achieve that end; (3) overt acts in furtherance of the combination or conspiracy; and (4) an effect upon a substantial amount of interstate commerce."); U.S. Anchor, 7 F.3d, at 1001.

prove an attempt to monopolize claim, the same showing is required to prove a conspiracy to monopolize.

B. Requiring Proof of a Specific Intent to Monopolize Is Not the Same as Requiring Proof of a Relevant Market.

MLS downplays the impact of the court of appeals' adoption of the minority view by attempting to harmonize the decision below with other conspiracy to monopolize cases. In doing so, MLS improperly equates two separate legal concepts: specific intent to monopolize and relevant market. While the same evidence that is used to prove a relevant market can sometimes—when the evidence of specific intent is unclear—be relevant to proving specific intent, the two are distinct concepts, determined by different standards that do not require the existence of one to prove the other.

In the context of the Sherman Act, a specific intent to monopolize is the intent "to destroy competition or build monopoly." See Times-Picayune Pub. Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 626-27 (1953). Showing a relevant market, on the other hand, requires proof not of the anti-competitive goals of the defendants but of the objective state of the relevant market. Specifically, to prove a particular relevant market, a plaintiff must prove that there are not sufficient available substitutes for the goods or services so that a person controlling such a market would be able to exercise the monopoly power to control price. See, e.g., United States v. E.I. duPont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 395 (1956).

Specific intent, then, measures what the defendant intended to do, while proving the existence of a particular relevant market is only necessary to measure market power. It is not necessary for proving the existence of a defendant's intent.[9]

[9] In this case the required intent was sufficiently evidenced by MLS's own documents, which demonstrated that the MLS Defendants engaged in their conspiracy with a specific intent to suppress players' salaries in the

MLS attempts to eliminate the distinction between specific intent and relevant market by arguing that in order to prove a specific intent, a plaintiff asserting a conspiracy to monopolize must make the same relevant market showing as a plaintiff alleging a unilateral attempt to monopolize. Although proof of the relevant market may be relevant to demonstrating the defendant's specific intent when the evidence of such attempt is ambiguous, that does not justify importing the requirement to prove a relevant market into the offense of conspiracy to monopolize, which substitutes proof of specific intent for any showing of market power.

Indeed, MLS concedes that this Court held, in American Tobacco, that market power is not an element of a §2 conspiracy. MLS Br. 22. MLS contends, however, that a showing of relevant market is still required to prove the claim. Id. But requiring an independent showing of relevant market without any necessity to prove market power makes no sense. Relevant market is the metric against which the market power of a defendant is demonstrated. Because proof of market power is not required to show a §2 conspiracy—a point that MLS concedes—requiring proof of a relevant market is an unnecessary hurdle that is inconsistent with the Court's decision in American Tobacco.

MLS argues that §2 was not intended to apply to those who conspire to monopolize but lack the capacity to fully accomplish their aim. That contention is contradicted by the absence of "any other significant domestic professional league to compete for players' services." A-960. See also MLS's business plan stating that "In the event that a credible rival league were established, it is probable that the MLS salary structure would be jeopardized," A-7919, and the testimony of Alan Rothenberg, the founder of MLS, that for MLS to "maintain this salary structure" for players, there could not be "any other significant domestic professional league to compete for players' services." A-7683.

language of §2, the aims of antitrust policy, and existing antitrust law. Had Congress not intended to punish those who act in concert with the intent to monopolize but lacked capacity to do so, it would not have used the word "conspire"—it is hornbook law that an actor may be liable for conspiracy even though he could not have fully committed the predicate offense.[10] When a conspiracy is aimed at achieving a purpose that is demonstrably anti-competitive, there is no need to inquire further about the extent to which the conspiracy could have succeeded. The same rationale underlies the Court's well-established jurisprudence that, under §1, concerted behavior designed to fix prices or reduce output are per se violations with no need to prove relevant market or market power. Indeed, if MLS were correct that antitrust policy dictated against punishing those who conspire to adversely affect competition without the capacity to do so, all of the Court's §1 per se jurisprudence would have to be overruled.

Finally, adopting MLS's position would also render the "combine or conspire" language of §2 entirely redundant. If conspiracy plaintiffs were required to show a relevant market, then no set of facts would give rise to §2 conspiracy to monopolize claim without also giving rise to either a unilateral monopolization claim or a §1 claim. The congressional intent to create a separate conspiracy to monopolize offense would be frustrated, and antitrust policy would suffer because concerted behavior with a specific monopolizing intent would not be sufficiently punished or deterred.

[10] "Because the essence of a conspiracy is an agreement, a failure to achieve the objective, even if factually impossible, is not a defense." United States v. Palmer, 203 F.3d 55, 64 (CA1 2000) (citations omitted).

C. The Court of Appeals' Relevant-Market Holding Involved Questions of Law That Arise in Every Conspiracy to Monopolize Case.

Apparently recognizing the likelihood that this Court would wish to resolve a significant split in the circuits concerning the conspiracy to monopolize offense, MLS not only attempts to minimize the split, but also seeks to obscure the impact of the court of appeals' decision on that split by portraying it as fact specific. MLS cannot obscure the fact that the decision turned on issues of law that are presented in every §2 conspiracy case and that form the basis for the existing circuit split. The trial court required Fraser to demonstrate the same relevant market for §2 conspiracy purposes as he was required to show to support his claims of §2 monopolization and attempt to monopolize. See App. at 68a, 75a-78a. The court of appeals affirmed this district court ruling, thus deciding that proof of a relevant market was required for Fraser to prove his conspiracy to monopolize claim. These elements of a §2 conspiracy are the same legal issues presented in every circuit every time a conspiracy to monopolize claim is pleaded. Until the Court determines what those elements are, the uncertainty over this basic question will exist in every §2 conspiracy case.

MLS seeks to paint the court of appeals' decision as entirely fact specific by focusing on the comment that "there may in principle be some cases in which one could argue that a conspiracy claim should be provable without a showing that the alleged market is a real economic market." 284 F.3d, at 68. This comment only strengthens the case for granting certiorari. If the decision below is understood to hold, as MLS contends, that some alleged §2 conspiracies do not require any proof of relevant market, while others do require such a showing, then the court of appeals has in fact announced a new, third legal rule that only further divides the circuit courts. The decision gives virtually no guidance on how courts should decide when to require a relevant market showing in a conspiracy to monopolize case. It will only further cause division, confusion, and uncertainty among the circuit courts, as different litigants in different parts of the country find that their similar claims are subjected to vastly different legal standards. This is precisely the situation in which certiorari should be granted by this Court.

II. COURTS OF APPEALS MAY NOT DENY A PLAINTIFF THE RIGHT TO A §1 JURY TRIAL BY ASSUMING WHAT ARGUMENTS THE PLAINTIFF WOULD HAVE MADE HAD SUCH A TRIAL TAKEN PLACE.

The court of appeals decided not to remand Fraser's §1 claims because it concluded that Fraser would have alleged the same relevant market that he alleged in his §2 claims had he not erroneously been denied the chance to try the other claims to the jury. This decision, which denied Fraser his right to jury trial on his §1 claims, merits review and reversal by this Court.

The court of appeals lacked the power to deny Fraser his right to a jury trial based on speculation as to what Fraser would have argued. Whether its speculation was correct, therefore, is irrelevant. Moreover, because Fraser lost his §1 claims on summary judgment, he never had the chance to develop his §1 argument beyond his pleading. MLS argues that Fraser's "discovery demands, pre-trial proceedings, expert opinions and trial evidence" establish that he would have argued that the U.S. market for Division I soccer players was the only relevant market for his §1 claims, but those post summary-judgment materials reflect the effect of the district court's single entity reasoning, which the court of appeals found to be incorrect.[11] MLS Br. 25. As noted in Fraser's petition and by the court of appeals, Fraser would have had an incentive to allege a broader market under §1 than §2. See Pet. 21.[12] Fraser should not be denied his right to try his §1 claims to the jury based on speculation that was both erroneous and beyond the court of appeals' power.[13]

CONCLUSION

For all of these reasons, Petitioners respectfully ask the Court to grant Fraser's petition for certiorari.

[12] Nor is there any merit to MLS's contention that Fraser would be collaterally estopped from alleging a different relevant market at a §1 trial. See Pet. 26-27. As the court of appeals explained, because the legal standards for §1 and §2 are very different, collateral estoppel would not apply. See 284 F.3d, at 59-60. Further, because Fraser has alleged that his §1 claim should be judged under the per se rule or "quick look" rule of reason, there is a substantial chance that he would not be required to prove any relevant market at all in a trial of his §1 claims. These issues should be remanded to the district court for consideration in the first instance.

[13] MLS's assertion that this case should be decided under federal labor law, and not antitrust law, is completely misleading. The district court rejected this argument, and the court of appeals chose not to address it, for the simple reason that the MLS soccer players are not unionized. See A-4897. Federal labor law is therefore not available to the parties as a means to resolve their dispute and the Court's prior decision in Brown v. Pro Football, Inc., 518 U.S. 231 (1996), is completely inapposite.
